

UNIVERSAL LIBRARY

123 960

LIBRARY

THE AMERICAN COLONIES
IN THE
EIGHTEENTH CENTURY

THE AMERICAN COLONIES
IN THE
EIGHTEENTH CENTURY

BY
HERBERT L. OSGOOD, PH.D., LL.D.

PROFESSOR OF HISTORY IN COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY

VOLUME II

Gloucester, Mass.
PETER SMITH
1958

COPYRIGHT, 1924, 1958
BY COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY PRESS

Reprinted, 1958, by Permission of Columbia University Press

CONTENTS

VOLUME II

PART ONE (CONTINUED)

CHAPTER XVII

	PAGE
THE EARLY EXTENSION OF THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND IN THE COLONIES
Characteristics of the Church of England	3
Its close alliance with the civil power	3
Growth of rationalism and latitudinarianism in the Church after the Restoration	6
Increased activity of the Church in the colonies	6
Gradual recognition of colonial authority in the Bishop of London	7
Interest of Henry Compton in colonial affairs	8
Virtual extension of the English act of Toleration to the colonies	8
The British policy of uniformity defeated by the Puritan revolt	9
The English Church in early Virginia	9
Establishment in Maryland. Work of Bray and Nicholson	11
Condition of the Maryland church	12
Maryland legislation disallowed	13
Establishment effected by the act of 1702	13
Partial establishment in New York	14
Act passed by Fletcher, 1693	15
Incorporation of Trinity Parish	16
Case of Mackemie and Hampton	17
Dispute over the possession of Jamaica parish	18
Attitude of Bellomont and Hunter toward the Church	19
Desecration of Trinity. Disturbed conditions in New York . .	20
Vesey appointed commissary in New York and New Jersey . .	20
Renewal of the Jamaica dispute. An Anglican church built .	21
Similar struggles in Westchester	22
The office of commissary	22
The office a necessary substitute for a resident bishop	23
The work of James Blair in Virginia, 1689-1743	23
Founding of William and Mary College	24
Blair's relations with the civil power	25
The question of induction	26
Brief incumbency of Bray in Maryland	27

	PAGE
His service in founding English missionary societies	28
The clergy of Maryland subject to lay supervision	29
Origin and work of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel . .	29
Bray's "Memorial Representing the State of Religion"	30
Incorporation of the Society	30
Business and support of the Society	31
The mission of Keith, Gordon and Talbot, 1702	33
The Society purely sectarian in its scope	34
Opposition to its activities among dissenters	35
Controversy provoked by Keith in Boston	36
Keith's dispute with the Quakers	40
Various missions established by the Society	41
Founding of the church at Stratford, Connecticut	42
Opposition to the movement in Connecticut	43
Missions established during the first fifteen years	44
The movement for a colonial episcopate	45
Appointment of a bishop urged by the missionaries	46
Steps taken by the Society for this end	47
The movement defeated by the death of Anne	48

CHAPTER XVIII

CULMINATION OF THE LEISLERIAN CONFLICT. MISGOVERNMENT OF LORD CORNBURY IN NEW YORK AND NEW JERSEY

Administrative uncertainty in New York upon the death of Bel- mont	49
Smith, senior councillor, yields to the Leislerians	50
Smith calls an assembly under protest	50
Formal statements by contending parties in the assembly	51
Arrival of Lieutenant Governor Nanfan, who identifies himself with the Leislerians	53
The new assembly Leislerian	54
Arrival of Atwood and Broughton, to be chief justice and attor- ney general	54
Factional conflict in the assembly under Nanfan	55
Withdrawal of ten members and the expulsion of others	55
Introduction of a bill to confiscate Robert Livingston's property .	55
Attempt to reimburse the Leisler family	57
Anti-Leislerian petitions drawn by Bayard and Hutchins	57
Their prosecution for treason	58
Weakness of the case and partisanship of Atwood	59
"Confessions" signed by the accused	60
Partisan activity of the Leislerian assembly	61
Arrival of Cornbury and downfall of the Leislerians	61
His appointment due to favoritism	62
His partisanship. Attack upon Leislerian councillors	62
Rout of the Leislerian officials	63

CONTENTS

vii

	PAGE
Charges preferred by Cornbury against Nanfan	65
Cornbury fails to settle Lady Bellomont's accounts	66
Questions of defence and supply under the anti-Leislerians	67
Assembly's address of complaint to the governor	68
Demand for the appointment of a treasurer	68
Legislation regarding salaries and supply, 1703	69
Question of the council's right to amend a revenue bill	70
Attempt of the house to appoint a treasurer	72
Plans for the defence of the city and province	73
The House permitted to appoint a treasurer under certain conditions	74
Financial irregularities under Cornbury	74
Issue of preferential warrants on a large scale	76
Suspension of Byerly objected to by the treasury	78
Irregularities continued in the absence of Byerly	78
Prolonged controversy following the return of Byerly	78
Charges against Cornbury preferred by Livingston	80
Opinion of the council upon the validity of the governor's warrants	81
Attitude of the assembly	82
"Misapplication" an element of constitutional growth in New York	83
The administration of Cornbury in New Jersey	85
Complicated nature of New Jersey politics	85
Mutual lack of sympathy between Cornbury and the province	87
Failure to secure a permanent revenue	88
The first assembly controlled by the proprietary party	88
Questionable means used to secure the ascendancy of the anti-proprietary, 1704	89
The proprietary party reestablished, 1705	90
Claims of Morris as to the terms of surrender	91
Cornbury upheld by the home government	92
The third assembly proprietary and hostile to Cornbury	92
Fruitless appeal to England by each party	93

CHAPTER XIX

HARMONY PARTIALLY RESTORED IN NEW YORK AND NEW JERSEY UNDER ROBERT HUNTER, 1708-1716

Administration of Lord Lovelace and Richard Ingoldsby	95
Action of the assembly on supply	96
Preparations for the Canada expedition	96
Administration of Robert Hunter	97
Colden's estimate of Hunter	97
Defenceless condition of the province upon Hunter's arrival	98
Regulation of fees and settlement of the governor's salary	99
Hunter aided by Lewis Morris	100

	PAGE
Administrative reforms in New York suggested by Hunter . . .	101
Continued deadlock between the houses on questions of revenue and defence	103
The new assembly occupied in providing for Walker's expedition	104
Renewal of the dispute over the amendment of money bills . .	104
Controversial statements issued by council and assembly . . .	105
A court of chancery erected by Hunter	106
Failure of the house to appoint an exclusive agent	107
Plan for the reorganization of the revenue proposed by Hunter	108
Controversy between the advocates of direct and indirect taxation	109
Grievances of Long Island voiced by Samuel Mulford	110
Indirect taxes favored by Hunter	111
A compromise effected on the revenue question	112
Supplementary legislation	113
Friends of Hunter appointed chief justice, agent and speaker .	114
The taxation question reopened by the act of 1716	114
Protests by Samuel Mulford in New York and England . . .	116
Hunter's incumbency prolonged by the death of Anne	118
His farce "Androborus"	118
Factional dispute in New Jersey under Lovelace and Ingoldsby .	118
An appropriation secured for the Canada expedition	120
Administration of Hunter in New Jersey	121
Three important laws enacted	121
Disputes between the two houses renewed	121
Hunter favors the proprietary party	122
Harmony restored in the session of December, 1713	123
Opposition to Hunter after the death of Anne	123
Controversy regarding the meeting place of the assembly . . .	124
The house controlled by Hunter's supporters	124
Strong ecclesiastical element in New Jersey politics	125

CHAPTER XX

MASSACHUSETTS AND NEW ENGLAND DURING THE ADMINIS-TRATION OF JOSEPH DUDLEY, 1702-1715

Appointment of Governor Dudley	126
A new type of administration in Massachusetts	126
Negotiations resulting in the appointment	126
Disappearance of the union with New York	128
Aims and significance of Dudley's administration	129
The problems of defence and salary	130
Dudley instructed to secure permanent salaries	133
These refused by the general court	134
Choice of councillors and speaker vetoed by Dudley	135
The house disputes the governor's control of expenditure . .	136
Demand for the rebuilding of Pemaquid and the granting of salaries renewed	137
Opposition raised by Dudley's enmity to the charters	138

CONTENTS

ix

	PAGE
Relations with other New England colonies	139
Dudley's criticisms of Rhode Island and Connecticut	139
Collapse of the attack upon the charters	142
Opposition to Dudley in Massachusetts	142
Success of his administration	142
Controversy between Dudley and the Mathers	144
Dudley attacked in "The Deplorable State of New England"	145
This answered by the "Modest Inquiry"	147
The currency question in Massachusetts	148
Early discussion of the subject	149
Prior issues made by the Massachusetts government	149
Early rating of coins	152
Alignment of parties upon the question of currency and banks	154
Revival of the project for a land bank	155
This opposed by the Dudleys	156
The dispute carried to England	157
Removal of Dudley sought by the bank party	158
The council attempt to assume the government after the death of Anne.	158

CHAPTER XXI

VIRGINIA DURING THE SECOND INTERCOLONIAL WAR

Important position of Virginia among the British colonies	159
Uneventful development of the province after 1690.	159
Virginia important geographically and a leading staple colony	160
The administration of Francis Nicholson	161
Removal of the capital to Williamsburg	163
Activities of Nicholson's first assembly, 1699	163
The revision of the laws, 1706	165
Administrative reforms. Jennings appointed secretary	167
Settlement of French refugees, 1700	167
Problems of war and defence after 1701	168
Trade restricted by the necessity of convoys.	169
Precautions against raids on the coast	170
Projected reorganization of the militia	170
Unfavorable reports regarding the militia by Nicholson and Quary	172
Reasons of the assembly for refusing aid to New York, 1700-1701	173
The requisition again refused, 1702-1703	175
Conference between Nicholson and Cornbury at New York	176
Nicholson involved in personal controversy	177
Break between Nicholson and Commissary Blair	177
Alleged irregularities of Nicholson	178
Evidence taken before the council	179
Nicholson supported by the assembly.	179
Nicholson recalled to report on the state of the province	180

	PAGE
The administration of Edward Nott, 1705-1706	181
Reorganization of the revenue after the death of William Byrd, Senior	182
Other administrative reforms accomplished	182
Precautions taken against attack by sea	183
The presidency of Edward Jennings, 1706-1710	183
Continued alarms of French privateers	184
A sloop fitted and commissioned by the province	184
Virginia relatively undisturbed by the first two wars	184

CHAPTER XXII

MARYLAND DURING THE SECOND INTERCOLONIAL WAR
CLOSE OF THE PERIOD OF ROYAL GOVERNMENT, 1699-1713

Maryland history generally uneventful during this period	186
Appointment of Nathaniel Blakiston, 1699-1702	186
Measures for the suppression of piracy and illegal trade	187
Economic problems under Blakiston and Seymour	188
Low state of the tobacco industry in Virginia and Maryland	188
Causes for its decline	189
Manner of marketing tobacco	190
General impoverishment of Maryland	191
Regulation of the size of hogsheads under Seymour	193
Legislation regarding the establishment of ports and towns	194
The act of 1706 and its disallowance	194
Agitation for a revision of the currency	195
Restrictions on trade with Pennsylvania and the Lower Counties	196
Relations between the assembly and executive	197
Legislative activity under Blakiston	197
Blakiston appointed agent in England	198
The administration of John Seymour, 1704-1709	199
Revival of the claims of Sir Thomas Lawrence	199
Activity of the proprietor in connection with legislation	200
Legislation against the Catholics	202
Priests reprimanded by the governor in council	202
The anti-Catholic legislation of 1704	203
Demand for change in the judicial system	204
Jurisdiction of the county courts enlarged	205
Other judicial grievances remedied	206
The provincial court reorganized upon instructions from the queen	207
Complaint against the provincial court	207
The problem of defence	208
Vote of £300 for the defence of New York unpaid	208
Objection to colonial union	209

	PAGE
The militia law reenacted without change, 1704	210
The law again revived with difficulty, 1709	211
Indian treaties renewed	211
The conspiracy of Richard Clark suppressed	211
Dispute over the lodgment of public arms	212
The return to proprietary government	213
Appointment of Governor Hart	213
Benedict Calvert converted to Protestantism	213
Hart confirmed as proprietary governor	214

CHAPTER XXIII

VIRGINIA DURING THE ADMINISTRATION OF ALEXANDER SPOTSWOOD,
1710-1722

Character and influence of Spotswood	216
Reforms urged in the collection of revenue	217
Recommendations regarding guardships and the militia	217
Legislation regarding the granting and seating of land	219
Instructions to Spotswood on this subject	219
The act of 1710	220
Grants limited to 400 acres by proclamation	221
Continued abuses in the granting of lands	222
Problems of territorial expansion	222
Discussion of the assembly's right to erect parishes	223
Exploration of the western country	224
The opening of iron mines opposed by the board of trade	224
The founding of Germanna	225
Unsettled state of the Carolina boundary	225
Economic depression caused by the low price of tobacco	225
Conduct of the war after 1710	226
Purchase of provisions for the Canada expedition	226
Forts built on the frontier. Assistance sent to North Carolina	227
Failure of the assembly to meet the expenses incurred	228
Unsatisfactory state of the finances	230
An appropriation made for the assistance of North Carolina	231
Unsettled state of the Indians	232
Plan for Indian reservations on the frontier, Christanna	234
The Indian trading company dissolved by royal disallowance	234
A grant of military supplies obtained from England	234
Growth of opposition to Spotswood	235
His sharp speech on dissolving the assembly, 1715	236
Exploration beyond the Blue Ridge	238
Reforms in the management of the revenue urged by Spotswood	238
Report rendered by the deputy auditor and deputy receiver	241
Suspension of deputy auditor Ludwell	242
Renewed opposition to Spotswood	243
Queries to the board of trade regarding his administration	243

	PAGE
Complaint of his encroachment upon the judicial power of the council	243
Spotswood supported in this by the board of trade	244
Futile efforts to effect a reconciliation	245
Refusal of the assembly to support the governor's Indian policy	247
Spotswood attacked in an address to the king	248
Counter attack by the governor upon the burgesses	248
Reconciliation between Spotswood and the council and assembly	250
The mission of Captain Martin to St. Augustine	251
Establishment of two new western counties, 1720	252
Spotswood's financial and landed interest in Spotsylvania	252
Concessions to settlers made by the crown	253
Correspondence with New York regarding the Iroquois	253
The Indian act and conference of 1722	253

CHAPTER XXIV

PENNSYLVANIA FROM THE ISSUE OF THE CHARTER OF LIBERTIES TO THE GOVERNORSHIP OF WILLIAM KEITH, 1701-1717

The Quaker proprietor	254
Homogeneous character of the population during this period	254
Close relations subsisting between Logan and Penn	255
Influential position of Penn in England and America	255
Decline of his influence in Pennsylvania	256
Disastrous financial dealings with the Fords	257
Difficulties of the Quaker government in Pennsylvania	258
Growth of the non-Quaker element	259
Disputed title to the Lower Counties. Their grievances	259
Legislative separation of the Counties from Pennsylvania	261
Defects of the charter of privileges	263
The question of the proprietor's veto power	264
Legislative power of the council	264
Right of the assembly to adjourn itself	265
Unfitness of Governors Evans and Gookin, 1703-1717	266
Differences between Lloyd and Penn and Logan	267
The house's "Remonstrance of 1704"	268
The unprofitable session of 1704-1705	269
Harmony restored in the new house, 1705-1706	270
Controversy over the judicial system	271
The system as constituted by the act of 1701	271
Effects of the royal veto	271
Points at issue between the council and assembly	272
Courts created by the governor's ordinance, February, 1706/7	274
Protest by the assembly	274
Attempt by the assembly to impeach Logan	274
The judiciary act of 1711. Its disallowance	275

	PAGE
The judicial system reconstructed by acts passed in 1715 . . .	276
The government's reasons for disallowance inadequate . . .	277
Dissatisfaction of the assembly with Evans	277
The assembly refuse to contribute to the defence of New York	277
Failure to organize a voluntary militia	278
Appointment of Gookin. Reorganization of Penn's financial affairs	279
Animosity between Gookin and the assembly	280
Appropriation of £500 for the Canada expedition	281
Renewal of the controversy between Logan and Lloyd	282
Reorganization of the assembly, 1710	283
Important legislation. Grant of £2000 to the queen	283
Negotiations for the surrender	283
Penn's proposals of 1703 and 1705	284
Counter proposals of the board and Penn's reply	285
Favorable report of the board to the secretary of state	285
Proposed agreement of 1712 frustrated by the ill health of Penn	285
Unsatisfactory relations between Gookin and the assembly	286
Gookin ignores the council	287
His dispute with the council and assembly regarding the affirma- tion	287
His charges answered by a representation of the assembly	288
Retirement of Gookin	289

PART II

THE COLONIES DURING THE INTERVAL OF PEACE BETWEEN THE SECOND AND THIRD INTERCOLONIAL WARS, 1714-1740

CHAPTER I

ATTITUDE OF THE CABINET, PARLIAMENT AND THE BOARD OF TRADE TOWARD QUESTIONS OF COMMERCE AND COLONIZATION
UNDER THE EARLY HANOVERIANS

End of the attacks upon the colonial charters	293
Aid requested by South Carolina in the Yemassee War, 1715	293
The proprietors agree to a mortgage or sale, but not to a sur- render	293
Bill regulating the chartered provinces lost in committee	294
Jeremiah Dummer's "Defence of the New England Charters"	295
The colonial charters of greater weight than those of English corporations	295
Valuable considerations rendered by the chartered colonies	295
The crown's grant of soil a mere right of preëmption	296
New England's record in war and defence reviewed	296
Defence of her polity and laws	297

	PAGE
Annulment of the charters by parliament essentially oppressive and unfair	298
Dummer's argument contrasted with official statements on the subject	298
Conflicts over jurisdiction between admiralty and common law courts	299
Opinion of Northey on admiralty jurisdiction under the act of 1696	299
Conflicting interests involved under the two jurisdictions . . .	300
Disputes on the subject in Massachusetts and South Carolina .	301
Opinion of Yorke on cases arising in Massachusetts, 1726 . . .	302
The mercantilist policy of Great Britain	303
The Methuen treaty with Portugal	304
Struggle over the French treaty of 1713	305
The "Mercator" and "British Merchant"	306
Views and policy of the Whigs	307
Authoritative statement of their commercial policy in the "British Merchant"	308
Personnel and influence of the board of trade, 1714-1748	310
Work of Doeminiqne and Martin Bladen	311
Secretary Stanhope's "Scheme" regarding the plantations . .	311
Commercial policy of the board of trade	311
Encouragement of naval stores	312
The activity of Joshua Gee. His defence of the northern colonies	312
William Wood's "Survey of Trade"	316
The projected bill of 1719 for encouraging naval stores defeated by the iron masters	317
Report on the condition of the northern colonies	317
Policy of the board on questions of territory and government . . .	318
Advocacy of an aggressive policy against French encroachments	318
Plans for colonial union	319
Cumming's "Scheme" for colonial taxation, 1723	319
Action of the board against illegal trade	320
Opposition to the development of colonial manufactures	321
The encouragement of naval stores and staples a corollary to this	321
The colonies' dependence upon homespun and household industries	322
Colonial industries classified according to the market	323
Factors governing the development of manufactures	323
Nature and extent of colonial legislation for the encouragement of manufactures	325
Opposition of the government to the development of the woolen industry	326
Reports received of the growth of wool in New England and elsewhere	327

CONTENTS

XV

	PAGE
General attitude of the board. The report of 1721	330
Report to the privy council on wool, 1728	330
Spotswood's report of his enterprise in Virginia	332
The "Discourse" of Sir William Keith on trade and plantations . .	333
Attitude and influence of other governmental bodies on trade policy	335
The privy council, treasury and admiralty little concerned . .	336
Policy determined by the king, cabinet and parliament	337
Questions of commercial policy generally subordinated to political expediency in the cabinet	338
The activity and influence of parliament in regard to colonial policy	339
Its vigorous and varied interest on subjects of trade	339
Parliament the supreme arbiter of imperial questions	340
Close connection between the board of trade and parliament . .	340
The parliament and cabinet a check upon the imperialist designs of the board of trade	340
Parliamentary legislation affecting the colonies, after 1714	341
Duties removed from the importation of Irish linen, 1717 . . .	342
Action upon naval stores and the transportation of felons . . .	342
Legislation affecting the tobacco trade	343
Permission granted to export rice direct to southern Europe . .	343
The act of 5 Geo. II, c. 22 for the suppression of hat making . .	345
Static character of colonial policy during this period	346

CHAPTER II

THE OVERTHROW OF PROPRIETARY GOVERNMENT IN SOUTH CAROLINA

Inefficiency of proprietary rule in the Carolinas	347
Discontent with proprietors' ecclesiastical policy	347
Confessed inability of proprietors to protect colonists	347
The Yemassee War. Raids and Ravages	347
Military strength of Carolina colonists	348
Slight cooperation of other colonies. Spotswood's conditional aid	348
Haggling and dissatisfaction	349
Governor Craven's competence	349
Spanish assistance to the savages	349
South Carolinians appeal to the crown	350
Proprietors declare helplessness	350
But new Hanoverian dynasty too much occupied to assume S. C.	350
Cost of war to the province	351
Earnest complaints of proprietors' behavior	351
Results of the War	351
Land opened for settlement by Indian defeat	352
Campaign for Protestant immigrants	352
Attempt to curtail importation of negroes	352

	PAGE
The growth of opposition to the proprietors	352
Decentralization of elections	352
Further petition to crown for relief	353
Arrival of Governor Robert Johnson	353
Colonists' self-confidence increased by conquest of pirates	353
Governor Johnson defends proprietors. Asks rent roll	354
And attempts, unsuccessfully, to appoint the powder receiver	354
Legislature passes discriminating impost law	355
Proprietors disallow important recent acts	355
Temporary restoration of harmony before this news reaches S. C.	355
The proprietary machine	356
Chief Justice Nicholas Trott	356
Colonel William Rhett	356
Secretary Shelton, of the Board of Proprietors	357
The revolt against the proprietary	358
Protest against Trott	358
Selfish reply of the proprietors. Withdrawal of land	359
A Spanish war threatens	359
The militia, when summoned, sign articles of association	359
Revolutionary action announced to Governor Johnson	360
He warns the assembly or convention and tries to dissolve it	360
Convention proclaims Colonel James Moore governor with new council	361
Convention organizes a government and sends agents to the king	361
Johnson, Trott and Rhett disagree	361
Johnson unable to turn warships against Charlestown	361
Anti-proprietary action of colonists coincides with crown's imperial policy	361
Proprietors continue to hold the land in South Carolina	362
But practically resign government to the Crown	362
Royal government set up	362
Further irritation of colonists at proprietors' attempts to sell	363
Their list of grievances against the proprietors	363
North Carolina still loyal to proprietors	364
Provisional government at Charlestown with Sir Francis Nicholson as governor	364
Councillors and other officials appointed	364
Temporary fortifications of the Altamaha region	365
Fort George built at river's mouth, 1721	366
Differences as to who should bear expense	367
South Carolina assembly controls garrison, etc.	367
Spanish protest	368
International conference	368
Fort George burned	368
Indian relations	369
A company monopoly	369

CONTENTS

xvii

	PAGE
Control of licenses	369
Restrictions lightened in 1721	369
Virginia traders complain of license system	370
Single commissioners, James Moore, George Chicken	371
Currency troubles	371
Planters demand paper money	371
Merchants oppose	372
The "bank act" of 1712	372
Continuous depreciation	372
Acts of 1722 and 1723	373
Extreme scarcity of specie in province	373
The merchants' memorial	374
Governor instructed to oppose all paper money acts	374
Sinking fund, 1724	376
Governor Nicholson closes his official life in colonies, 1726	376
President Arthur Middleton now in control	377
Paper money men suggest issue of currency to rebuild Fort George, 1726	377
Assembly prorogued without action	378
Local meetings and riots	378
Arrest of Landgrave Smith; meetings are prevented	378
President and council try to direct attention to defence	380
Assembly leaders attempt to fix paper money value by law	380
Council oppose as violating proclamation money law	381
Revival of Landgrave Smith's case	382
Losing fight of proprietors	383
Criticism of Nicholson by their partisans	383
Arguments fail to check king's complete assumption	384

CHAPTER III

TRANSITION TO ROYAL GOVERNMENT IN NORTH CAROLINA

North Carolina a purely frontier community more than any other colony	385
Isolation due to lack of good port	385
After 1715 peace makes improvement possible	386
But society still so crude as to rely on barter	386
The progress of government in North Carolina	387
Law reform in 1715	387
Sectional feeling between Bath and Albemarle counties	387
Proprietors object to colonial interference with land laws	388
Proprietors' obstruction to settling Bath county overcome by governors' connivance	389
Some antipathy between council and assembly in re bills of credit, etc.	390
North Carolina plagued with undesirable governors	391
Scandalous intimacy of Governor Charles Eden with Teach, the pirate	391

	PAGE
Edward Moseley sentenced for criticism of governor and others	391
Governor George Burrington encourages Bath settlement . . .	392
But guilty of arbitrary acts and abusive language	394
Chief Justice Gale goes to England and secures his removal . .	394
Sir James Everard as violent as Burrington and less efficient	394
Province agitated by personal feuds of officials	395
The surrender of the Carolinas to the crown	397
The proprietors, excepting Carteret, take the crown's terms . .	398
Governor Everard despite sale issues many speculative land patents	398
Burrington selected to be first royal governor	399
Crown's inertia shown in year's delay of instructions	400
Governor Burrington's limited success in making North Carolina a proper royal province	400
Controversy over assembly clerk's appointment finally won by governor	400
Many reforms proposed	400
Controversy over medium in which fees were to be paid . . .	401
Controversy over payment of quit rents	401
Controversy as to who should appoint treasurers	404
Won by the assembly	405
Revenue and expenditure	406
Burrington's talent for making enemies	406
Value of controversy in revealing structure of institutions . .	408
Question of the governor's right to erect precincts	408
Burrington nominally governs without assembly or council . .	410
Burrington recalled, after failure despite good intentions . . .	411

CHAPTER IV

NEW YORK AND NEW JERSEY BETWEEN 1716 AND 1730

This a period of comparative quiet in New York	412
The assembly of 1716	412
Revenue acts of 1715 and 1716 returned to the colony for amendment	413
Their objectionable features defended by the assembly	414
But removed in the act of 1718	414
Hunter active as virtual agent in England	414
Schuyler warned to make no unnecessary changes during the interim government	416
The administration of Governor William Burnet	416
The question of continuing the assembly	416
Reorganization of the council	417
A supply granted for five years, 1720	418
Indian relations under Burnet	418
The impost act for defence disallowed	419
The sale of Indian goods to the French prohibited	419

	PAGE
Opposition to the enforcement of this policy	420
Hearings before the board of trade, 1725	420
Prohibitions displaced by duties on the Indian trade	421
The acts of 1727 and 1728	422
The Indian trade acts disallowed in 1729	422
Questions of revenue and finance	422
The treasurer required to give security	423
Objections to the cost of auditing the revenue	423
A settlement of the question obtained by the governor, 1723	424
Personal differences between the governor and Stephen De Lancey	425
A reduced revenue granted for three years	426
An appropriation made for building Oswego	426
The administration of John Montgomerie, 1728-1731	427
The act against prosecutions by information	427
Attack upon the validity of the court of chancery	428
The court defended by the council	429
Montgomerie inactive as chancellor	429
A five years' supply obtained from the assembly	429
The reduction of salaries. Protest of Chief Justice Morris	429
Apprehension of the increased prestige of the house and the consequent decline in that of the council	430
Territorial policy of the New Jersey proprietors	430
Reorganization of the land office in East New Jersey	431
Coxe supplanted in West Jersey. Growth of the Quaker interest	432
Successful suit of the proprietors against the Elizabethtown patentees	432
Attempt to establish the division line. Permanent land offices established	433
Unsuccessful effort to run the New York boundary	433
Surveys extended by the proprietors in northern New Jersey	433
Hunter's later years in New Jersey mainly free from political contest	434
The presidency of Lewis Morris	434
The administration of Burnet in New Jersey	435
Opposition to Burnet in the first assembly	435
The distribution of assemblymen shifted by the executive	436
Harmonious relations maintained with subsequent assemblies	437
Trent, of New Jersey, appointed chief justice	437
Argument of Burnet in favor of bills of credit	437
The triennial act, 1727	438
Controversy in the assembly over the recording of deeds and titles	439

CHAPTER V

CONTROVERSIES DURING THE ADMINISTRATION OF COSBY AND CLARKE.
THE ZENGER EPISODE, 1730-1740

The presidency of Van Dam after the death of Montgomerie . . .	443
Fortification of Crown Point by the French	443
Controversy between Van Dam and Governor Cosby	444
Character of William Cosby. His appointment to New York . . .	444
His cordial relations with the assembly	445
Break between Cosby and Van Dam regarding perquisites . . .	446
Cosby's suit in equity against Van Dam	447
Question of the legality of non-statutory courts	447
The argument for the defence	448
Disagreement of the court	449
Opinion of De Lancey regarding the court of exchequer . . .	449
Removal of Chief Justice Morris and reorganization of the court	450
Morris and his son elected to the assembly from Westchester, 1733	451
Their faction successful in New York City, 1734	452
The publication of Zenger's "Weekly Journal"	452
Its political discussions	453
Attacks upon the executive and the ruling clique in New York . .	454
Charges made against Councillor Harison	455
Session of the assembly in April, 1734	456
Opinions of Smith and Murray upon the validity of prerogative courts	457
The trial of John Peter Zenger, 1734	459
Numbers of the "Journal" condemned by the council. Arrest of Zenger	459
Attacks upon the validity of the judges' commissions	459
Disbarment of Smith and Alexander	460
Trial before the supreme court on the charge of libel. Argu- ment of Andrew Hamilton	460
Acquittal of Zenger	461
Reinstatement of Smith and Alexander	462
The movement for a dissolution of the assembly	463
Legality of the court of chancery upheld by the board of trade . .	463
Cosby advised not to sit in the legislative council	464
Decision of the board on the case of Morris	464
Death of Cosby. The presidency assumed by George Clarke . . .	465
His incumbency disputed by Van Dam	466
Clarke unable to secure a session of the assembly	466
Clarke commissioned lieutenant governor, 1736	467
New York City magistrates appointed by both factions . . .	467
The house organized by Clarke	468
Questions of revenue and appropriation revived by the assembly . .	470
Appropriations fixed without regard to executive warrant . . .	470

	PAGE
Opponents of Clarke elected to the assembly	471
Address of the assembly in reply to the governor's speech . . .	471
The disputed election between Van Horne and Philipse . . .	473
The exclusion of Jews from the franchise. Admission of non- resident freeholders	474
The triennial act passed and disallowed	475
Additional legislation. Clarke favorable to bills of credit . . .	475
Lessened hostility toward the executive	476
The house dissolved upon its refusal of revenue for a term of years	478
Annual appropriations continued by the new assembly	479
Specific appropriations and annual grants continued, 1740 . .	481
Messages between the governor and house regarding revenue and defence	481

CHAPTER VI

IMMIGRATION INTO THE AMERICAN COLONIES DURING THE FIRST HALF OF THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY

Immigration essential to the colonizing process	483
European conditions favoring emigration to America	483
The process encouraged by companies and proprietors	484
The transportation of criminals and indenture of servants . .	485
White servitude most prevalent in Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia	485
Distribution of national stocks in the colonies prior to 1690 . .	486
New England and the south almost exclusively English . . .	486
Foreign stocks elsewhere not of great political significance . .	487
The colonial population a reflex of the racial stock in Great Britain	487
Emigration of the Huguenots after the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes	488
The French element numerically inferior but valuable	488
The influx of Germans after 1700	490
Germany, as a nation, excluded from the colonization of America	490
German immigration to Pennsylvania and elsewhere prior to 1700	491
Palatines settled at Newburg with aid from the British govern- ment	492
Extensive emigration from Germany and Switzerland to Eng- land, 1709	493
Settlement at Newbern, North Carolina	494
Palatine settlement in New York under Governor Hunter . . .	495
Failure of the enterprise. Removal of the Palatines to Scho- harie	495
Their land granted to speculators	496

	PAGE
Unsuccessful mission of Weiser and Scheff to England	497
Partial removal of the Palatines to settlement on the Mohawk	498
German immigration to Pennsylvania	498
Settlement of Palatines from New York under Weiser	498
The occupation of German Valley, New Jersey, 1707	499
The movement to Pennsylvania continuous after 1727	499
Emigration favored by Pietism in Germany and the Netherlands	499
Influence of Francke and the University of Halle upon Luther- ans in America	501
Settlement of Germantown and the Wissahickon by Pietists	503
Extensive immigration of the Mennonites after 1710	503
Settlement of the Dunkers. Their similarity to the Baptists	504
Settlement of the Moravians in Georgia. Subsequent removal to Pennsylvania	504
Their influence upon John Wesley	505
The founding of Nazareth and Bethlehem	505
The economic basis of the German emigration	506
Suffering and exploitation endured by many immigrants	506
German emigration from Pennsylvania southward through the valley	507
German settlements in the coast region of Georgia and South Caro- lina	508
The colonists here predominantly Lutheran	509
German emigration to New England	510
The settlement under Waldo east of the Kennebec, 1740	510
The settlers petition Massachusetts for relief, 1743	511
Their town destroyed by Indians and subsequently rebuilt	511
Immigration encouraged by Massachusetts, 1749	511
The activities of Joseph Orellius and Hefret Luther	512
Additional settlements founded in Maine and Massachusetts	512
Emigration from the British Isles	513
The proportion of convicts and indentured servants difficult to estimate	513
British emigrants of the period predominantly Scotch and Scotch Irish	513
Causes of the emigration	514
Establishment of the Protestant colony in Ulster, 1610	514
Emigration of Scotch Irish prior to 1700. Settlement in Mary- land	515
Religious and economic conditions causing emigration from Ulster after 1700	516
Emigration to New England. Founding of Londonderry, 1719	518
Later settlements on the New Hampshire frontier and the Ken- nebec	518
The Scotch Irish in New York and New Jersey	519
Attempted settlement of Captain Campbell in Washington County	519
The Scotch Irish an element of strength on the frontier	519

	PAGE
Large Scotch Irish accessions to Pennsylvania and New Jersey . .	520
This stock predominant between the Susquehanna and the Alle- ghanys	520
Their movement southward into the valley of Virginia	522
Its extension to the Carolinas and upper Georgia	522
Quakers a minor element in Irish emigration	523
Policy of England and the colonies regarding naturalization	523
Rights conferred by denization and naturalization	523
The English acts of 1710 and 1714 not operative in the colonies	524
Absence of legislation in New England	525
Legislation of other colonies	525
Power to naturalize conferred on the governor in Virginia . .	526
Legislation in the Carolinas	526
Naturalization by the colonies of questionable validity else- where	527
Control over naturalization exercised by the British government	527
Grants by the colonies generally regarded as local in effect . .	527
The governors forbidden to issue letters of denization unless authorized by commission, 1700	528
The act of parliament, 1740	528

CHAPTER VII

PENNSYLVANIA DURING THE ADMINISTRATIONS OF KEITH AND GORDON, 1717-1736

Sir William Keith appointed deputy governor	530
Logan's support because of Keith's record in America	530
Keith's early pronouncements wholly favorable to proprietors	531
His generous support from the assembly	531
Controversies as to the inheritance of Pennsylvania	531
The government placed in temporary trust	531
Provision of lands for William Penn, the younger, the step- mother and her three sons	532
The Whig ministry declines to take Pennsylvania as a royal province	532
The conduct of Keith during the controversy and afterward . . .	532
With assembly's consent he continues to act	532
Declines to take commission from William Penn, heir-at-law	533
His course approved by the lords justices	534
By death of heir-at-law and Hannah Penn the property passes to the "young proprietors"	534
The trustees do not interfere in government	535
Keith's affability secures support of Logan and Penn family,	535
But he eagerly cultivates the assembly's good will	536
Logan comes to mistrust his loyalty to Penn	536
Keith reduces the legislative and executive functions of the council	537

	PAGE
Logan removed from secretaryship	538
Keith refuses to be bound by Hannah Penn's instructions . . .	539
At Logan's instance he is reproved	540
Keith claims independence of council in legislative matters . . .	540
The assembly supports Keith against Logan and the proprietors	540
Keith, Gordon and the judiciary	540
The commissions to run from king, not proprietors	540
The judicial system not on a statutory basis	540
The governor vainly tries to enlarge jurisdiction of lower courts	541
The case of the Fame	542
The supreme court regains its jurisdiction as court of exchequer	542
Gordon heads a court of chancery	543
Protests against this court	543
The assembly supports the protests	544
Law officers of the crown confirm Gordon's position	545
Yet chancery remains in abeyance until after 1750	545
And allow assembly to control it	545
Keith and territorial rights of the proprietors	545
Appropriates some proprietary land beyond the Susquehanna River	545
Keith and the currency question	546
Arguments in favor of paper money	546
"Mobish elections" of 1721 and 1722	547
Keith strikes hands with the common people	547
Logan argues for closely restricted issue	547
Keith for "liberality" and widens breach with proprietors . . .	548
The Act of 1722-1723; bills secured by real estate	549
Proprietors issue a warning, but allow the act	549
Paper money men protest at Keith's removal	549
Benjamin Franklin's "Modest Inquiry"	550
Gordon and the currency question	551
Yields to inflationists	551
Acknowledged benefits of moderate issue of paper money . . .	551
Keith after removal	552
Brief career in the assembly	552
Loses support of Lloyd	552
Boasts of possible return as royal governor	552
Goes to England leaving dwindling faction of malcontents . . .	552
Gordon's commission	553
Close dependence upon council	553
New commission on death of Hannah and Springett Penn . . .	554
Gordon's ill-health raises question of successor	554
Logan and council succeed as temporary head	554

PART ONE

(Continued)

THE COLONIES DURING THE FIRST
TWO INTERCOLONIAL WARS, 1690-1714

CHAPTER XVII

THE EARLY EXTENSION OF THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND IN THE COLONIES

AN institution like the Church of England, especially the characteristics which it had come to possess by the early eighteenth century, cannot be adequately described in a few paragraphs. But it may be possible even within a limited space, to indicate some of its salient qualities. Like so much in English history, it is a compromise, a condition nicely poised between Catholicism and the more radical Protestant sects. Its origin was due to balanced relations in both secular and ecclesiastical politics in the sixteenth century, which could scarcely have resulted otherwise than in an institution of that character. The creed of the church embodied the doctrines which were common to the Protestantism of the Continent, but important mediaeval and Catholic elements were retained in its spirit, ritual and government. Under the stress of conflict these elements, centering about the episcopate, its succession and powers, have from time to time been emphasized, making the church one of the most conservative elements in English life. Its leaders have fostered ancient tradition, seeking to antedate even the papacy and to connect in a peculiar sense their communion with the church of the early centuries and of the Roman empire. They have dreamed that in them the churches of the Patriarchates would come to their own again and the legitimate claims both of Catholics and Reformed be harmonized and satisfied.

When, in the reigns of Henry VIII and Elizabeth, the connection with Rome was severed, the union between church and state in England became even closer than it was during the middle age. For this reason the revolt from Rome was always represented to be an important and necessary step toward the perfecting of national unity. The Church, as the result of this step, became more completely subordinated to the crown. The necessity of this was recognized as a means of defence not only against enemies from abroad, but against schism when it began to show itself as a result of the growth of radical Protestantism at home. The union of altar and throne then became one of the watchwords of politics and the throne occupied the leading place in the partnership. Though the Church of itself exercised great social influence, it was used to buttress the civil power in its struggles with enemies foreign and domestic. The duty of loyalty to established institutions has always been one of the chief burdens of its message. A certain section of the Church, which was in close connection with public affairs, even went so far as to teach that resistance to government was a sin. This doctrine and that of the divine origin of the kingship sprang from a common root. The orthodox Church upheld the state and the state extended its protection and support around and beneath the Church. Under the stress of conflict both became acutely sensitive toward dissent as implying possible sedition or even treason. In idea, and so far as possible in practice, they appeared as the two sides of one whole. The Church was thus in the full sense of the word an "Establishment," a most important function of which was to uphold in the domain of morals and religion the mixed monarchical and aristocratic régime which England had inherited from the middle age.

For its hold on the nation the Church relied very largely on its historical antecedents, its hierarchy, the ornate ceremonial of its worship, as well as on the learning and piety of many of its clergy. It sought to worship God in the beauty of holiness and to a large extent it succeeded, though, like all ritualistic religions, with a stupefying monotony and routine. It appealed to the sense of the artistic, the ancient, the formal and institutional, more than to the doctrinal or emotional, as the source of its influence. It did not look exclusively to the Bible, but to the Bible as interpreted by the Church and human reason, as its rule of faith and order; least of all did it find such a rule in the so-called inner light or consciousness of the untrained mind. It set a high value upon learning, but that learning was of a traditional type, and it was limited to the higher clergy and to a favored class among the laity who, as a rule, were closely connected with the nobility. Any schools which it might found were naturally imbued with that spirit. The Church was orthodox, and in its eyes schism or separation was an offence comparable with sedition or treason in the state. In certain ways it was intolerant, as were all religious bodies, but its system of inquisition was by no means as searching into life and morals as was that of the Puritan, or even that of the Quaker after he had stiffened into regularity. The emphasis which the church laid upon ritual betokened a degree of moral and intellectual indifference which the radical Protestant sects deprecated or scorned. Its learning and aristocratic pride kept it from ever descending to the depths of fanaticism and bigotry which have too often found expression in the sects which sprang directly from the people.

After the Restoration much was heard of the policy of comprehension, the object of which was to so modify certain forms and requirements as to open the way for the return of Presbyterians and Independents. But, instead, the reactionary legislation of the early years of Charles II drove a large Puritan element out of the Church, while the schism of the nonjurors which followed the Revolution removed from it a valued conservative group. The former event made nonconformity permanent in England, while the Revolution which gave rise to the nonjurors emphasized anew and in the most decisive way the fact that the English Church was Protestant and that its return to the Catholic fold was impossible. At the same time its separateness from the Protestant bodies on the Continent was fully recognized.

On the other hand, for a long time sympathy with Jacobitism continued to be felt by many more Anglicans than were included in the group of nonjurors, while in quick succession a Calvinist and a Lutheran were brought to the English throne, though under the condition that they should become communicants of the English Church. The Toleration Act was passed in England, and by the Act of Union a few years later the integrity of the Scotch Church as an establishment was recognized. These are indications of the variety of opinions which it was necessary for the church to recognize. With the approach of the eighteenth century a latitudinarian spirit, or readiness to acknowledge that, as the essential truths of Christianity are few, other sects than one's own may share in their possession, spread among the higher clergy. The spirit of indifference and of rationalism which was growing in the country also had a marked effect on the Church. The aversion to mysticism and enthusiasm, which was always one of its characteristics, was strengthened by these tendencies. The Church felt the effects of the low moral tone which had existed in society since the Restoration, the growth of secular interests, the sense of security which followed the Revolution and the failure of the policy of Louis XIV and the Stuarts, with the result that it fell into a condition of spiritual lethargy from which with difficulty it was awakened by the Wesleyan revival. And yet, in the midst of this period of spiritual decline, by means of various agencies from the archbishop down, and under the lead of missionary societies which were founded at the close of the reign of William, the Church undertook to spread its influence far and wide throughout the colonies. This was regarded as its share in the general task of checking the tendency there toward independence and of substituting ecclesiastical conditions which should be more in agreement with those of England.

In this account of the colonies we have advanced to the closing years of the seventeenth century with only a few scattered references to the English Church. We have seen some Catholics and a great variety of Protestant sects appear and take their place among the composite of faiths which colonial society on its religious side exhibited. From the beginning the English Church had been predominant in Virginia and had occupied a minor position in a few of the other colonies. But the time has now been reached when it began in earnest to seek a place of some prominence in their religious history considered as a whole. In religion even more than in government or industry the colonies had wandered far, and on this side of their development the contrast between England and themselves appears most marked. In England the process of religious development had begun with unity and had tended toward diversity; in the colonies the original condition was one of the widest diversity possible within Protestantism. In America the parent church must content itself with the place of a sect among sects or to an extent overcome the conditions which had naturally grown up in the colonies. To the former alternative she could not at that period bring herself to submit, while the latter object it would never do to proclaim, though her conduct always betrayed her desires and thus provoked jealous suspicion on the part of her opponents. It was characteristic both of the Anglican reaction which followed the Revolution in England, and of the transition to the system of royal provinces which was in progress in the colonies that the church should now seek a larger place in colonial life, and that in undertaking this she would lean heavily upon the support of the state.

That some one English bishop should have jurisdiction over the rising colonial Church followed necessarily from the constitution of the Church itself. But until after the Restoration it was wholly undecided upon whose shoulders this should rest. The archbishop of Canterbury might naturally have occupied the position, but with the exception of the activity of Laud while he held that office, and of one occasion during the reign of James II, he seems scarcely to have been thought of in this connection. London was the centre of trade and the capital where was located the company which founded Virginia. From it also proceeded many other colonizing enterprises. Bishops of London had a certain connection with these, and while he held that office, Laud's tireless activity in the interest of religious conformity extended to regions beyond the seas. But affairs drifted on until after the Restoration before any decision upon this matter was reached. Then it came gradually to be understood that the bishop of London was the metropolitan of the colonies. The fact that this result was definitely reached was due to the activity of Henry Compton, who became bishop of that see in 1675. As the need of episcopal guidance was beginning to be more widely recognized in the colonies, Compton tried to find out what his authority was. The lords of trade were consulted, but no adequate precedents were found. Compton procured the insertion in instructions which after that time were issued to royal governors of the statements that worship should be celebrated according to the rites of the Church of England and that no minister should be presented to any benefice in their colonies without a certificate from the bishop of London that he was in conformity with its doctrines and practices.¹

The interest of Compton in the colonies and his activities on behalf of the Church within them steadily continued and grew. He was, of course, impressed with the weakness of its hold in the continental colonies, as well as with the imperfect means at his command for exercising control over them and procuring more and better clergy. But he obtained the grant of a bounty of £20 for each minister and schoolmaster who went to the colonies, and an instruction that no one should be permitted to serve in either of these capacities without a license from the bishop of London. Beginning with 1685, clauses were inserted in the instructions to royal governors that they should give all encouragement to the exercise of the jurisdiction of the bishop of London, except in collating to benefices, granting marriage licenses and probate of wills, which remained with the secular authority. Whether this provision was confirmed by an order in council or not, it was acted upon by Compton and his successors, and that without interruption, after the Revolution of 1689.

In the consideration of this subject some reference should be made to the act of toleration which was passed in England in 1690. Though in this no mention was made of the dominions, the dissenters in the colonies often spoke as if they considered it, along with the bill of rights and earlier legislation of the same character, as one of the guaranties of their liberty, and the legislatures of a few of the colonies declared it to be in force within their limits. We hear vaguely of certain utterances of British attorneys general which were in harmony with that view.² Of course these statements could only mean that the principle of the act of toleration was recognized as in harmony with ecclesiastical relations in the colonies, and that too while apparently they forgot the fact that no reference to the dominions was made in the act of uniformity which was passed after the Restoration. The toleration act provided for the exemption of Protestant dissenters from the penalties of the persecuting acts of Elizabeth, James I and Charles II on their taking the new oath of allegiance and subscribing a declaration against certain leading Catholic practices. But even then their meetings could be held only under a system of registration and license, they were subject to the payment of tithes and their clergy were forced to subscribe to certain of the articles of religion. They were exempted from the penalties of the Sunday laws only on condition of attending their own chapels. On comparing these provisions with conditions as they were in the colonies, it will at once be seen that the act could not be literally enforced there, even in provinces which had made it a part of their own legislation.

¹ A. L. Cross, The Anglican Episcopate and the American Colonies (Harvard Hist. Studies) chapters I and II. Bishop Sherlock's Report (1795) N. Y. Col. Docs. VII, 360. See also the Histories of the American Episcopal Church by Anderson and Perry.

² Hawks, Contributions to Ecclesiastical History, Virginia, 109. Maryland declared it in force in 1702 and 1706. Kilty, Statutes, p. 179; Bacon, Laws of Maryland. In New York the declaration was made in an act of 1704 incorporating Trinity Church.

It was of course the original intention of the British government, under the Tudors and Stuarts, that the English Church should be planted in all the colonies. It was naturally expected to go along with civil government, as the two were organically connected. Several of the acts of Elizabeth and of James I gave ample legal authority also for the establishment of the Church in the colonies, even to the exclusion of dissent. Had it not been for the Puritan Revolt that policy, toward which Laud and the government of Charles I were headed, would doubtless have been carried into execution. Like the Huguenots of France, the Puritans would have been suppressed at home or driven as exiles into foreign countries and religious conditions would probably have existed in the English colonies analogous to those of Canada, accompanied with an equally blighting effect on their growth. To the fact that the trend of historical development was quite the opposite of this is due, to a very large extent, the character both of modern England and of the United States today.

Such form as was taken by church establishments in the colonies was the result of their own legislation, controlled and limited to a certain extent by instructions to the governors and other executive action by England. Virginia was the only continental colony in which the English Church may be regarded as established from the first and where for a long time there was practically no opposition from dissenters.¹ In 1624, when Virginia became a royal province, it was enacted, "that there be an uniformity in our Church as near as may be to the canons of England, both in substance and circumstance, and that all persons yield readie obedience unto them under paine of censure." Absence from divine service on Sunday without excuse was made punishable by fine. In every settlement a house or room should be procured for church services and ground sequestered for the burial of the dead. By this and later enactments provision was made for the levy of a church or parish rate, payable in tobacco and corn — later in tobacco only — for such purposes as the support of the minister, the building of churches and purchase of glebes. In 1632 the office of church warden was regulated. In the legislation of ten years later vestries came out into full view, with the power of the parishioners to choose their ministers, who should be presented to the governor and by him inducted into office. Clergymen might be suspended by the governor and council but removed only by the general assembly.

In 1662,² in harmony with Governor Berkeley's instructions, provision for the Church as established was somewhat extended. It was enacted that there should be a glebe in every parish and that a convenient house for the minister should be built thereon. It was also provided that candidates for appointment should produce testimonials from some bishop in England and subscribe to the laws and constitutions of the Church of England before being presented and inducted. By this and earlier enactments and practice it was made clear that dissent would not be tolerated in Virginia. When, on the appointment of Lord Culpeper in 1679, instructions to the governors assumed substantially their final form, they were empowered to collate to benefices, grant licenses for marriage and probate of wills, have a care for the orthodoxy of schoolmasters and uphold good morals. The jurisdiction of the bishop of London was by that time clearly recognized, but a considerable part of the functions he exercised in England had been transferred to the governor.

¹ Hening, I, 68, 122, 180, 183, 240-242. Anderson, History of the Colonial Church, I, 470, very suggestively criticises Laud for having allowed a system of appointment so different from that of England to get a foothold in Virginia. It was too similar to that existing between the clergy and their parishioners in New England, and, he implies, would have been prevented if he had sent a bishop at once to Virginia.

² Hening, II, 29, 44.

After the Revolution the policy of extending favors to the Anglican communion, going in some cases to the extent of establishment, was not abandoned. The experience of the two Carolinas in this regard, they being at that time proprietary provinces, has been related in a previous volume. But it was more natural that such a result should follow in a royal province, and it did follow in Maryland soon after its government was assumed by the crown and in a part of New York soon after the accession of Fletcher to its governorship.

In Virginia the Anglicans had everything their own way, and it was not until the eighteenth century was well advanced that an opposition of any importance was to develop. In Maryland, Catholics, Puritans and Quakers formed a majority against which the English Church very slowly made headway. There a famous experiment in government under a system of balanced confessions had been made, and Anglicans had held the inferior place. In 1676 John Yeo wrote in his well known letter to the archbishop of Canterbury, that there were but three Protestant ministers of the Church of England in the province.¹ Lord Baltimore, when called before the committee of trade, was able to show that this statement was somewhat exaggerated, but even according to his representation Catholics and Anglicans together constituted only one fourth of the population. Under these conditions the establishment of the Church would seem to have been an impossibility.

But in no colony did the pro-Anglican aspect of the English Revolution reveal itself so clearly as in Maryland. The reason for this has already been explained.² By that crisis the Catholics were thrown politically into a position of hopeless inferiority in this province. With the overthrow of the Calverts they lost their natural leaders, and when the proprietary family returned to power it was as Protestants. Meantime, into the place of the Catholic executive stepped one which was made up of Anglicans and which had behind it the support of the British government. Though Catholics were not disfranchised till a quarter of a century later, by test oaths they were at once excluded from the assembly and from office.¹ The commission and instructions of Governor Copley concerning religious affairs were the same as those given to all royal governors and steps were soon taken to put them into execution. Presently appeared the Rev. Thomas Bray, an Anglican clergyman of high character, great zeal and organizing power, who was not only very influential in directing the attention of Englishmen to the needs of the establishment in the colonies at large, but who in a very special way forwarded its interests in Maryland.² Along with him, after Copley's death, worked Governor Nicholson, whose ample purse was always at the service of the Church, and whose influence in its support was more widely felt than that of any other man who ever held office in the colonies. By these two men, aided by many who were less prominent, and by the natural trend of the times, the establishment of the Church in Maryland was brought about. But it was the church of the minority of the people, and always had to contend against a powerful, though divided, opposition.

¹ Cal. St. P. Col., 1675-6, p. 435; 1677-1680, p. 117-122. Chalmers, Annals, 365, 375. Hawks, Maryland, 49. Mereness, Md. as a Proprietary Prov., 437 et seq.

² Osgood, American Colonies in the 17th Century, III, 477 et seq.

The condition of the Church before establishment is indicated by a statement made at the time of Nicholson's appointment. This was to the effect that in Kent county there were two parishes, one church built and another planned, but no minister; Anne Arundel county had four parishes, but no churches or ministers; Calvert county had five parishes, three of which had churches but no ministers; Charles county had four parishes laid out, but no ministers; Somerset county was in similar condition; Cecil county had three parishes, one having neither church nor ministers; of Baltimore, Talbot and Dorchester counties there was no certain information.

The second act, which was passed after the arrival of Governor Copley in 1692, was one confirming to the Church of England in the province all her rights, liberties and franchises, providing that parishes should be organized in the counties, that vestrymen should be chosen and taxes levied for the support of the Church. Four years later this, and an act supplementary thereto, were disallowed in England, the original act because it contained a clause giving to the province the privilege of Magna Charta.¹ In this same year (1696) another act for the establishment of the Church was passed, which contained a clause declaring that the inhabitants of Maryland should enjoy all their rights according to the laws of England in cases where the laws of the province were silent. The Catholics and Quakers were the sects who chiefly opposed the measure, and in London the latter procured its repeal on the ground that it declared all the laws of England in force in Maryland, which was a clause of another nature than that set forth in the title of the act.²

¹ McKinley, The Suffrage Franchise in the English Colonies, 70 et seq.

² Hawks, 75, 83.

In 1700, through the influence of Dr. Thomas Bray, another somewhat rigid act was passed which contained a clause providing that the service books of the English Church should be read in every place of worship within the province. This was objected to by Attorney General Northey on the ground that it might extend to the meeting places of the dissenters. He also criticized its provision for select vestries because it was contrary to the law and practice of England, where the whole body of the parishioners was admitted to a vote and a share in parish business. In England also the vestrymen did not choose the church wardens, but the minister chose one and the parishioners the other. To the power of fining vestrymen for not taking the oath Northey also objected because it would exclude Quakers from the benefit of the solemn affirmation, which they were allowed by the law of England.³ The Quakers also attacked the measure on the general ground that it provided for an establishment, to which they were opposed. The bill was sent back to Maryland with amendments which made it satisfactory to the lords of trade and was passed by the assembly in 1702 and approved by the crown. Churches which came under the definition of the act were those for the maintenance of whose clergy a definite revenue should be required to be raised by the laws of the province. In a clause at the end of the statute it was expressly declared that Protestant dissenters should have the benefit of the act of toleration and Quakers the benefit of the act 7 and 8 William III concerning the solemn affirmation. In 1704 the system was completed by a law fully guaranteeing the titles of land given to the parishes for glebes.

¹ Bacon, Laws of Maryland. Acts of P. C. Col. II, 837. Cal. St. P. Col., 1693-1696, p. 636. Hist. Colls. of Am. Col. Church (Maryland), 35.

² Md. Arch. XXV, 93. C. O. 5/715, Council to Board, July 1700, Acts of P. C. Col. II, 837. Cal. St. P. Col., 1699, p. 561. Hist. Colls. of Am. Col. Church (Maryland,) 29. Hawks, 89.

³ Md. Arch. XXIV, 91, 207, 265. C. O. 5/715. Report of attorney general, recd. Jan. 14, 1700/1. Observations of Quakers, same date. Hist. Colls. (Maryland) 41. Hawks, op. cit. 97, 107.

In New York the predominance of dissenters, and possibly of the irreligious, was greater than it was in Maryland, though it lacked a Catholic element of any importance. The proportion of dissenters to churchmen was estimated as forty to one, and the only church where service according to Anglican forms was regularly held was in the fort at New York. There the governor's chaplain officiated. The Anglicans were also confined to a few sections in the southern part of the province, and in New York City, Westchester, and Queens counties, where they were strongest, they were far outnumbered by dissenters. Among the mixed population were certain French and Germans who might naturally affiliate with the Anglicans, but among the large Dutch population, especially of the north, they could hope to make little progress. The assembly reflected the condition of the province, and all except a few of its members were unfriendly to the Church, especially if its plans appeared to be at all ambitious.¹ Owing to the lack of stated services, so disorderly had the people in Westchester become, that Colonel Heathcote ordered the militia companies to train on Sundays so that public order might be better maintained.²

As soon as Governor Fletcher arrived, steps were taken to change this condition. In October, 1692, he recommended the passage of a bill to provide for a ministry in the province, ¹ S. P. G. Mss. Letter of Col. Heathcote to Bishop of Bristol, Feb. 25, 1716; Heathcote to S. P. G., June 13, 1714. Abundant proof of these statements may be found in all the histories of New York City, in Bolton's History of the Church in Westchester County and in the Papers relating to the Churches of Queens County in Doc. Hist. of New York, III.

² Bolton, op. cit., p. 24.

but no action was taken. Before a new assembly, about a year later, the same subject was more forcibly presented. A bill was then passed which, because of its loose and obscure wording, was returned by the governor with the request that it be amended.¹ To this the assembly refused to accede, and, though Fletcher prorogued it in the hope of securing a better measure, he failed and had finally to accept the bill as it stood. In due time it was approved by the home government.

The act itself afforded the strongest testimony that New York was not and could not be an ecclesiastical unit.² It provided that in the City and County of New York, in Richmond, Westchester and Queens counties a levy should be made on all taxables, the revenue from which should go for the support of "good and sufficient Protestant ministers" there to be settled. Of these two were to be resident in Westchester, two in Queens, one in Richmond and one in New York City. The amount of their support was specified, and in order to the raising of it vestrymen and church wardens were to be chosen, and the vestrymen in cooperation with the county justices should lay the tax. The church wardens should keep and expend this revenue, rendering account thereof before the justices and vestrymen.

Could there have been any doubt as to the intention of the framers of this act to establish the Church of England and no other in the four counties named, it should have been removed by the fact that it provided for vestrymen and church wardens, officials not known in the polity of the dissenting sects. But an ambiguity was introduced into the act by the reference to the settlement of "good and sufficient Protestant ministers." By this, in accordance with Anglican usage of the time, was meant the clergy of the Established Church.³ But in New York the dissenters, using the term in the broad and non-technical sense, claimed that they and their clergy might share in the benefits of the act, that they might put dissenting ministers into the livings created by the act. The assembly supported this claim, and it furnished an opportunity for any amount of sharp political tactics between the sects, which added not a little to the variety, as well as the futility, of New York politics. Support also was given to the contention of the dissenters by the wording of the Duke's Laws, in which provision was made for boards of vestries and church wardens, to seats in which dissenters were freely admitted.

¹ Ass. J. I, 30-34. C. J. I, 39. Dix, History of Trinity Church, I, 78 et seq. Bolton, History of the Church in Westchester County, Introduction. The act is said to have been drafted by James Graham, then speaker, and for its execution much depended on the support of Heathcote.

² N. Y. Col. Laws, I, 328 et seq. This law came up for discussion in 1755, when King's College was founded, and in the "Watch Tower" articles then published in the "New York Mercury" many pertinent observations concerning it may be found.

³ Dix, History of Trinity Church, I, 86.

In New York City, as the majority of those who were entitled to vote for vestrymen and churchwardens were dissenters, they were able for some time to control, or at least greatly to influence, church affairs. The board which was thus elected in the city was the town vestry, and being made up in 1694 chiefly of dissenters who were elected by the freeholders, they insisted that a dissenting clergyman should be called. The governor proposed his chaplain as entitled to appointment. No appointment was made that year. The next year, under a threat of prosecution by the governor, the board chose the Rev. William Vesey, but he was not even notified of this action. The vestry then appealed to the assembly and it resolved that the board had the right to call a dissenting Protestant minister. Fletcher told them it was not their province to explain an act they did not make, and the laws were to be interpreted by the judges. The next board obeyed the law according to its intent and selected Vesey, who was duly inducted as the first rector.¹

In 1697 this situation was remedied in New York City by the granting of a charter of incorporation to a body calling itself "The Members in Communion of the Church of England Established by Law."² In 1704 this same body, with a slight change in its title so as to include the rector, received incorporation by an act of the legislature. The support of its rector was also in part assured by rents from the "Queen's Farm," the title to which was confirmed to it by Queen Anne. This, enhanced by the growth of the city, laid the foundation of the wealth of the parish. By these measures Trinity parish was fully established, with its own vestry and church wardens and its power to act independently of the city vestry. The latter, however, continued to exist for many years, but it could no longer hinder the development of Trinity parish along the lines intended by the framers of the act of 1693. It was later contended with reason that this parish was the only body of Anglicans in New York which was really established.

¹ Dix, I, 82 et seq.

² Ibid., Appendix, p. 455.

Under this act, taken in connection with the governor's instructions, the relations between the Church and civil power in New York were illustrated by two well known events. One was the arrest by Cornbury, in 1706, of Mackemie and Hampton, two well known Presbyterian clergymen, because on a passing visit they preached in the province without a license from the governor.¹ The other was the prolonged struggle between the Presbyterians and Anglicans for control over the parish of Jamaica on Long Island. Cornbury, as well as Fletcher, was an active patron of the English Church, though, as with everything else, his interest was measured by the extent to which he could use it for the promotion of his own power and schemes. It was in harmony with the condition of New York politics in the eighteenth century that the Church had to rely so much for its early progress upon such brilliant exponents of godliness as were these two governors.

In the case of Mackemie and Hampton, Cornbury, in utter disregard of usage both in language and government, claimed that his instruction to allow no clergyman to be appointed to a living in New York unless he had a certificate from the bishop of London gave him the right to license every one, whether dissenter or not, who should preach in the province.² This interpretation would have been wholly unwarrantable even if it had been applied only to dissenting ministers who were proposing to settle in the province; but the two accused clergymen were only brief visitors and had no intention of remaining in New York. They also brought with them certificates stating that they had taken the oaths and in other ways conformed to the conditions prescribed in the toleration act, and Mackemie declared that he was ready to sign before the governor the articles of religion, with the exceptions mentioned in the act. To apply to a man like him the rule improvised by Cornbury and his advisers, was to make the arbitrary will of the governor the sole rule of action. The accused were imprisoned for six months, and only then was Hampton, the less important of the two, released under a writ of habeas corpus issued by Mompesson. Mackemie was brought up for trial under an indictment by a grand jury. He was defended by three lawyers, two of whom were the ablest in the province — William Nicoll and David Jameson. Bickley, the attorney general, represented the government. His argument in the case was to the effect that the penal statutes of Elizabeth, enforcing supremacy and uniformity, were in force in the colonies and that the accused had violated them. This was a notable change of position on the part of the government, and it too was met by a denial that either those acts or the act of toleration were in force in the colonies, and by the assertion that the New York act of 1693 provided for the toleration of Protestant dissenters, as did the instruction to the governor to allow liberty of conscience to all except papists. The jury brought in a verdict of not guilty and the prisoner was released, though he had to pay costs to the amount of more than £83.

¹ Mackemie's Tryal, in Force, Tracts, IV. N. Y. Col. Docs., IV, 1186 et seq. Briggs, American Presbyterianism, 116, 152, App., IX.

² Mackemie's Tryal, p. 34. The Case of Mackemie and Hampton is also reviewed at length in Foote's Sketches of Va., First Series.

The case of the church in Jamaica illustrates the difficulty which the Anglicans found in securing possession of the church edifice and settling a clergyman in a parish where the great majority of the inhabitants were dissenters who had long supported their own ministers. It was a case similar to that which arose in New York City, though it differed in that Jamaica was a country parish and was distant from the seat of government. A church edifice had been built there under the acts of 1693 and 1699. In 1704 Cornbury inducted Mr. Urquhart into the living.¹ But he found Mr. Hubbard, a Presbyterian, in possession and living in the parsonage, he having been called there two years before by the local vestry and church wardens, all or a majority of whom were dissenters. Cornbury issued a warrant ejecting Hubbard, though this naturally caused much dissatisfaction among his parishioners. Urquhart, however, remained in undisturbed possession until his death in 1709.¹ Then, with the approval of the local justices, the Presbyterians again came into possession of the church and parsonage, and a clergyman of their own faith was settled among them. Hunter was now governor, and he inducted Thomas Poyer into this living, Poyer, like Urquhart, having been sent over as a missionary by the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel. Hunter, under advice from Chief Justice Mompesson, decided that a resort to ejectment was illegal, and so Poyer found himself unable to get possession of the parsonage or to collect his salary. When he appealed to the governor for help, he was advised to sue for his rights and the governor offered to pay the costs.

¹ See S. P. G. Correspondence for letters from Urquhart and Heathcote in 1705 and 1707.

Bellomont, who in so many things was the opponent and critic of Fletcher, was not prominent as a patron of the Church. Hunter stood in a similar relation toward Cornbury and his policies. He was a keen observer and possessed to a degree Swift's powers of sarcasm and denunciation. He clearly saw the hypocritical pretense and sham which were involved in much of the patronage which Fletcher and Cornbury lavished on the Church, and the element of oppression which inhered in it. In some of its features it surpassed anything which the High Church and Tory party attempted in England under Anne. The patronage of the Church by Nicholson involved also a large element of absurdity to those who really knew his character. About Talbot and perhaps others hung the suspicion of Jacobitism and of the nonjuror schism, and of this Hunter was not slow to avail himself in his letters home. Vesey, a man of New England origin and a recent convert, at this period of his career seemed to be a priest of the political type, under whose management it is to be believed that the material more than the spiritual interests of his parish flourished. His name was closely involved with those of men of the Cornbury régime who were engaged in crooked politics, and the least that can be said of him is that his zeal led him into bad company.

¹ S. P. G. Correspondence, Letter from members of Church at Jamaica Feb. 6, 1716. Doc. Hist. of N. Y. III, 198 et seq. N. Y. Col. Docs. V, 313, 326, 328, 334, 943, 972. Briggs. op. cit. 150 et seq.

Proof is afforded as well of the intense passions of the time as of the almost incredible baseness of which some in the colonial communities were capable by acts of desecration which were committed in Trinity Church on a night of February, 1713.¹ This inflamed the resentment of all Anglicans and, so far as the particular outrage was concerned, won for them the sympathy of right-minded Christians of every name. The feelings of jealousy on the part of Vesey toward Hunter were increased by the fact that the latter had the chapel in the fort repaired and services conducted by the chaplain of the garrison resumed there. As the governor attended at the chapel in person and also those who disliked the rector, a permanent reduction in the size of the congregation at Trinity Church was threatened. It was claimed that this step involved the opening of a chapel within the parish without the consent of the Trinity corporation, a proceeding which was calculated to divide the church. A murder committed by blacks on Long Island occasioned the terrorizing of the community by rumors of a negro insurrection—the first instance of this kind in New York—and nineteen presumably innocent human beings suffered death in its most horrible forms as a consequence. The school for negroes which Elias Neau, the catechist, with tireless devotion had conducted for years became the object of undeserved attack and for a time was broken up. These disturbed conditions led not unnaturally to an appeal by the Anglicans to their superior authorities in England. In 1714 Vesey visited England for this purpose, returning late the following year. His salary was withheld during his absence by the city vestry, but assistance toward his support while abroad was granted by the Venerable Society. In abundant letters Hunter, supported by Morris, defended his own conduct and attributed sinister motives to his opponents.² Ecclesiastical issues were involved with the politics both of New Jersey and New York, and Talbot and Henderson, along with Vesey, came in for ample denunciation from the pen of the governor. So far as the rector of Trinity was concerned, these charges did not avail. They were disregarded and Vesey returned with the appointment as commissary for New York and New Jersey, and a futile order from the bishop of London to the church wardens of the city to pay his salary. The accession of the Hanoverians to the English throne had meantime relieved Hunter's mind of the pressing fear of removal, while by his astute management a modus vivendi had been reached between him and the assembly. Therefore, with the return of quiet in affairs of government, church squabbles in the city tended also to abate, and the commissary and governor were able to maintain tolerable relations until the close of the latter's term.

¹ Ms. Correspondence of S. P. G.; Doc. Hist. of N. Y., III, 444-458, reprinted in Eccl. Recs. of N. Y., III; Dix, Hist. of Trinity Church, I, 180.

² Doc. Hist. of N. Y. III, 435; N. Y. Col. Docs. V, 310-329; N. J. Arch. IV, 155-226.

But this quarrel reacted upon the question at issue in Jamaica. While it was at its height and under the advice of Vesey, Talbot and other ardent Anglicans,¹ Poyer declined to prosecute his opponents without the knowledge of his superiors in England. Vesey and his friends then sent, through the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, a request to the queen that the governor's instructions be changed so that cases relating to the Church might be admitted to appeal though sums less than £300 were involved.² This request was granted by an order in council early in 1713. Under advice given in accordance with this, Poyer finally brought suit before the supreme court of New York, for the recovery of his salary.³ A favorable judgment was obtained.

But accompanying and following this trial the collection of the rate in the parish was resisted or avoided by dissenters, riots occurred, a long and bitter struggle went on among the county justices and local vestrymen and church wardens, accompanied by summary removals of officers and no end of recrimination.⁴ From this the clergymen concerned, — especially McNish, the Presbyterian, — did not keep themselves free. Independents in New England and in Great Britain interested themselves in the struggle,⁵ as they had in the case

¹ N. Y. Col. Docs. V, 310-329.

² Doc. Hist. of N. Y. III, 265, 268. From entries in the Journal of S. P. G., April and May, 1715, it appears that it saw that the clause was continued in the instructions which were newly issued to Hunter after the accession of George I.

³ Doc. Hist. of N. Y., III, 275, 280, 304, 309.

⁴ Ibid., III, 283-303.

⁵ Briggs, American Presbyterianism, 154, 157.

of Mackemie. In 1731, a few months before the close of his life, Poyer wrote to the Society which he had long served,¹ of "the great and almost continual contentions that I have struggled withal among the Independents in this parish, having had several lawsuits with them before I could have the salary which the Country has settled upon the Minister of the Church of England, several other suits for some Glebe lands which we have lost, and at last even the Church itself of which we had the possession 25 years is taken from us by a trial at law."² In this last trial Morris presided as chief justice, and though a decision was reached which was evidently in the interest of peace and in agreement with the popular will, his alleged partiality in the case was made by Governor Cosby one of the reasons for the suspension of Morris from his office. The Anglicans, however, by this time and with the aid of Cosby had been able to build themselves a church and so left their rivals in possession of the original edifice. Such struggles as this, though less prolonged, between Anglicans and dissenting majorities occurred in other places in New York under the act of 1693, so that Morris, though an Episcopalian, wrote that he believed the Church would have been in much better position if there had been no act in her favor. In all the towns of Westchester county the Anglicans had to struggle for a foothold against opposing majorities among the people and in the vestries, led in some cases by ministers from New England.³

We have seen how that part of the bishop's functions which were mainly secular—the probate of wills, the issue of marriage licenses and the presentation to benefices—had passed by custom in the colonies to the governors. This left to the bishop of London in connection with the colonies the purely ecclesiastical functions of confirming, of consecrating churches, of ordaining, or issuing certificates of orthodoxy to candidates, suspending and degrading ministers, and the other duties which were involved in the oversight and discipline of the Church and clergy.⁴ All of these it was very difficult, if

¹ Doc. Hist. of N. Y., III, 307, 310.

² Ibid., 312; N. Y. Col. Doc. V, 943.

³ N. Y. Col. Docs. V, 323. Bolton op. cit.

⁴ Cross, op. cit., 2-3.

not impossible, for him to exercise from a point so remote as London. Ministers could not be admitted to orders without going to England in person. The rite of confirmation could not be properly administered unless the bishop was present in the colonies. Without a resident bishop, therefore, or a suffragan, the constitution of the colonial church was rightly regarded by its communicants as almost fatally defective. Hence arose the demand for one or more colonial bishops. But for the time the only device which seemed possible was the appointment of commissaries. Their jurisdiction did not extend to the laity at all, but only over the clergy. They were empowered to hold visitations, to call conventions of the clergy and to exercise general supervision over their conduct.¹ The commissaries, acting under the constant direction of the bishop, were to correspond with him and keep him fully informed as to all matters affecting the Church. The only penalty which they could impose was that of suspension, subject to appeal to the archbishop or a great officer of state. The powers of the commissaries were slight, but they well reflected the undefined state of the episcopal jurisdiction in the early eighteenth century. Their weak position might, however, be to a degree overcome by the strong personality of an incumbent.

The royal provinces, and particularly those where the Church was established, were directly under the administration of the bishop, and to these commissaries were sent. Prominent among the clergymen who held this position were James Blair in Virginia, Thomas Bray, Christopher Wilkinson and Jacob Henderson in Maryland, Gordon, Johnson and Alexander Garden in South Carolina, William Vesey in New York. Roger Price held the office for a time in New England. In the person of Blair, the first appointee, who served from 1689 to his death in 1743, the office reached in some respects its highest point of strength and efficiency.² Notwithstanding the prejudice against which he had to contend as a Scotchman, Blair maintained himself as one of the leading personalities in Virginia for half a century. His position as councillor, as president of the college and as rector of Bruton parish, the two former offices being such as no other commissary ever dreamed of attaining, not only furnished him an ample support but gave him an influence in Virginia which far exceeded that of a mere representative of the bishop of London. As commissary Blair received £100 a year out of the quit rents, to which was added £200 annually for his services as councillor and £150, later increased to £200, as president of the college. Governors came and went, and the going of three of the most prominent among them — Andros, Nicholson and Spotswood — he hastened, but he remained. For a time Spotswood overtopped him, but his leadership was brief when compared with the life-long activity of Blair in Virginia. His activity as a preacher was continuous and for a time of a rather high order. As a leader of the clergy and in all his secular relations he was able and aggressive, choosing wisely his positions and defending them with vigor. He elevated the office of commissary to a degree of influence which it never reached in the hands of others, though he was never beset by the perplexities which arose from having to contend with a population the majority of whom were dissenters.

¹ Cross, p. 295 et seq.

² Hist. Colls. of Am. Col. Church, (Virginia); Hawks, Contributions to Ecc. History, (Virginia); Motley, Life of Blair, in J. H. U. Studies.

The first notable achievement of Blair, in connection with his office, was the founding of William and Mary College, of which he was president for forty-nine years. He was the leader in raising a fund for it in Virginia and in persuading the legislature there to give it support. In England, as agent, he won for the plan the support of the leading bishops. In a memorial which was submitted to the treasury in England it was stated that over £2000 had been subscribed in Virginia, and it was hoped that any deficiency in the income from this source and from expected subscriptions in England would be made up from the impost duty on liquors. As sources from which grants to the college might be made in Virginia, the quit rents and escheats were referred to. In harmony with suggestions made in the memorial the following revenues and sources of revenue in Virginia were transferred to the account of the college: £2,000 from the quit rents of Virginia, a penny in the pound on all tobacco exported from Virginia, a duty on the export of skins and furs, the office of surveyor general with its fees and profits, and 20,000 acres of land, one-half of which lay on the south side of Blackwater swamp and near the North Carolina line, and the other half in Pamunkey Neck near the forks of the York river.¹ The right of special representation in the house of burgesses was also given to the college. The establishment of this institution was the crowning work of the English Church in Virginia and put the seal on that province as the leader in all that Anglicanism as such was contributing to American civilization. For half a century this was the only church college in the colonies, too remote, however, to be in any close sense a rival of the two Puritan colleges of New England. Wherever Anglicanism extended church schools of a lower grade were opened, like the college imitations on a small scale of the stagnant educational system which then existed in England, but all upholding a type of religious conformity which was less severe and inclusive than that of New England.

While Blair was commissary something like a conflict between the Church and the civil power may be said to have gone on in Virginia. It began with Andros, and as the governor maintained his usual reticence concerning these, like other charges, we have only Blair's side of the case.² He claimed that Andros in everything adopted a course of action toward the Church which was the opposite of that of Nicholson. Blair accused him of unfriendliness toward the college, of indifference or actual opposition to the increase of ministers' salaries, of diverting the quit rents from the clergy — on whom the privy council had ordered that they should be temporarily bestowed — to other uses, of neglecting to induct, of fomenting jealousy against ecclesiastical discipline, of putting affronts on the clergy. In December, 1697, a long hearing occurred on these charges before the archbishop of Canterbury and the bishop of London, Blair being present both as assailant of the governor and defender of himself, and Andros being defended chiefly by Colonel Byrd of Westover. Blair easily disproved the charges that he had unduly promoted or favoured Scotchmen and that he had wrongfully taken the salary as president of the college while it was in process of construction. He then turned upon Andros, charging him with delaying subscriptions to the college, granting away the land set apart for it, failing duly to promote the collection of the export duty on tobacco which had been assigned to it, and so mismanaging the revenue that less than half of it went to its proper destination. He told how, just before the accounts were to be passed, because he was Scotch-born, the council of Virginia, under the lead of the governor, voted that he could not sit as a member, because the act 7 and 8 William III c. 22 required that all places of trust and those relating to the treasury in the dominions must be in the hands of native-born subjects.¹ The commissary had well worked up his case with the bishops. Their sympathies were clearly on his side. Early the next year Andros, now an old man, resigned his office, Blair claiming that his action had furthered this, as did his advocacy of the appointment of Nicholson as the successor of Andros.

¹ Hist. Colls. of Am. Col. Church (Virginia), 3 et seq. Hartwell, Chilton and Blair, Present State of Virginia, Cal. St. P. Col., 1689-92, pp. 452, 575, 671; ibid., 1693-96, p. 154; ibid., 1696-97, p. 457. Hening, Stats. of Va., III, 123, 357.

² Hist. Colls. of Col. Church (Virginia), 10-65, 75.

With Nicholson also, notwithstanding the latter's great services to the Church, Blair, along with other members of the council, presently became involved in a most violent quarrel. This had no special connection with ecclesiastical affairs, but was part and parcel of the intolerable relations into which Virginia was thrown by the half insane passion of Nicholson, of which a general account has been given elsewhere. Whatever were the merits of this affair, Blair shared with the leading members in the governor's abuse and helped in bringing about his recall,² but his influence with the clergy suffered seriously as the result of the quarrel.

The question of the induction of clergymen into their livings was raised in the controversies of Blair with all three of the governors whom he opposed. The commissary complained that, owing to the failure of Andros to act, ministers were hired by their vestries from year to year and so kept in a subservient position and excluded from the use of the glebes.³ Nicholson he charged with persistent neglect in this matter, and the best explanation of this which Quarry was able to give was, that he was waiting for an opinion from the attorney general in England under which the governor would be able to act effectively against vestries which should refuse point blank to receive a candidate whom it was proposed to induct.¹ The opinion rendered by Sir Edward Northey,² in 1703, was to the effect that in cases where the parishes presented the candidate and the governor inducted, the incumbent was then in for life and could not be displaced by the parishioners. But if the parishioners did not present within six months after a vacancy occurred, their right should be held to have lapsed and the governor should collate to the benefice and the incumbent should likewise hold for life. The spirited controversy which arose between the governor and the commissary upon this subject is reserved for later treatment.

¹ Blair was later restored to the council; ibid., 81.

² Ibid., 69-112, 131-138. On p. 82 et seq. is a criticism of Blair by Robert Quarry.

³ Ibid., 15.

Dr. Bray, though he was appointed commissary of Maryland in 1696, did not arrive there until the spring of 1700 and returned to England in the summer of the same year. Thus he was in actual service in his province only a few months. While there he held one visitation, the clergy to the number of seventeen being called together at Annapolis.³ Under his lead they reached resolutions on catechetical instruction, preaching, private labors and the prevention of ministers of scandalous lives obtaining a settlement in the province. Preliminary steps were also taken for disciplining one such clergyman. Save in its lack of answers to queries sent over by the bishop of London, this may be taken as a typical example of work done at a visitation. The great and invaluable services which Dr. Bray performed for the colonial church were rendered in England, where, as the result chiefly of his personal efforts, the Society for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge and the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel were founded in aid of missionary work in the colonies. Both have continued their activities until the present day, enlarging them on a scale commensurate with the growth of the British empire. In connection with the former Bray brought together upward of fifty parochial libraries in the colonies and other countries abroad — some containing more than two hundred volumes each — and caused them to be distributed through the various colonies where Anglican ministers were regularly officiating.¹ Then he devoted himself to the task of procuring missionaries, a work the result of which will soon demand our attention. As we have seen, he was also chiefly instrumental in securing the passage and acceptance of the act for the establishment of the Church in Maryland.

¹ Ibid., 86.

² Ibid., 127.

³ Hawks, Maryland, App. See Hawks' account of Bray, beginning on p. 83 Perry, Hist. of Am. Epis. Church, I, 138 et seq.

Another object to which Bray gave much attention, both in his own interest and on behalf of those who were to follow him, was the effort to provide a maintenance for the commissary.² He had a twofold plan, the purchase of an estate for his use at a cost of about £500, and the attachment to the office of the trial of testamentary causes. It was with the understanding that he was to have the proceeds from the last named source — about £300 per year — that he accepted the office. A clause providing for this seems to have been introduced into one of the acts for the establishment of the church, but was lost with the act. The estate also was never secured, and therefore no regular provision was made for the support of the office in Maryland. In Virginia, as we have seen, Blair received his support from his living at Williamsburg and his salary as president of the college.

On Dr. Bray's return to England, he deputed three of the best of the Maryland clergy to exercise his powers, but they never acted. Irregularities resulting, Bray at once applied to the bishop to appoint a commissary, for he had then abandoned hope of returning to Maryland. The Rev. W. Huetson, of the English Church in Ireland, was appointed, but because of Governor Seymour's violent opposition to the residence of a commissary in the province, he never came over.¹ The legislature then passed a bill, similar to that which occasioned so much excitement in South Carolina, for the establishment of a lay commission to administer discipline among the clergy, but this was vetoed by the governor. Governor Hart, who succeeded in 1714, cared more for ecclesiastical interests, and soon after his arrival he called the clergy together and propounded queries to them to ascertain whether worship according to the Book of Common Prayer was regularly celebrated, also the sacrament administered, and whether there were sufficient churches and if they were kept in repair, whether ministers had glebes and a competent maintenance, whether they were in orders and members of vestries.² Their answers to these queries were mostly in the affirmative, though it is pretty clear that they should not have been so. Notwithstanding the fact that under Seymour severe acts against Catholics had been passed, the clergy also complained of the growth of popery as well as of the immorality of the people. But a letter which Governor Hart wrote later to the bishop of London throws light on the character of the clergy themselves who were making these statements. He said that some of them were in education and morals "a scandal to their profession," and he wondered how such illiterate men could secure admission to orders.³ It was already the belief of some that the clergy of Maryland suffered from the fact that the Church there was established, and it seemed evident that their character compared unfavorably with the missionaries who were sent over to the colonies where the Church was not in alliance with the state. However that may have been, the need of a commissary was evident, and in 1716 two such were appointed—Jacob Henderson for the Western Shore and Christopher Wilkinson for the Eastern Shore.

¹ A. B. Keep, The Library in Colonial New York, p. 27. In 1697 Bray published in London "An Essay Towards Promoting all Necessary and Useful knowledge both Divine and Human in all Parts of His Majesty's Dominions." In this he set forth his plan for libraries and appended a list of suitable books.

² Hist. Colls. of Am. Col. Church (Maryland), 51, 57.

The organization through which the Church made its growing influence most widely felt in the colonies was the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts.⁴ This

¹ Hist. Colls. (Maryland), 57 et seq. The violence of Seymour's opposition may be accounted for by the fear that the jurisdiction of a surrogate, above referred to, might be transferred from the governor to him.

² Hawks, 138. Hist. Colls. (Maryland) 74 et seq.

³ Hawks, 149.

⁴ Humphreys, Historical Account of the S. P. G. Pascoe, Digest of the Records of the S. P. G. Perry, op. cit., I. Overton, Life in the English Church, 1660-1714, Chap. 5.

was one of the leading instrumentalities through which the devotion of Compton, Tenison, Bray and others among the clergy of the age of Anne found expression. The society which at the middle of the century had been formed among the Independents as a result of the work of John Eliot in New England served now as a precedent for action, but the body of which it was a direct offshoot was the Society for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge, which was founded in 1699. A legacy of Sir Leoline Jenkins for the establishment of two fellowships at Oxford, the holders of which should serve as chaplains in the fleet or settle as missionaries in the foreign plantations, indicated the kind of service that was needed and a way in which funds might be procured. After his return from Maryland in 1700 Dr. Bray published "A Memorial representing the present State of Religion on the Continent of North America." This he dedicated to the archbishop and presented to the bishops and other patrons of religion. In this pamphlet the state of religion in the different colonies was briefly reviewed for the purpose of showing the weakness of the Church and the need of missionaries to spread its truths. The conclusion was that forty such were needed in the continental colonies, together with Newfoundland and the Bermudas. Starting from the impressions of George Keith, who had recently come over from the Quakers, the inference was drawn that many of them were ready to embrace Anglicanism and therefore that the conditions were favorable for a general effort. Those who should go out—men of sterling worth—must be supported for the first three years from funds raised in England, and after that period from glebes and other forms of support in the colonies. Therefore Bray urged that the clergy and laity of each diocese in England subscribe enough for the support of at least one missionary.

In the spring of 1701 a committee of the lower house of convocation was appointed to inquire into ways and means for promoting religion in the foreign plantations. The king was made acquainted with the spiritual destitution in the colonies, and therefore, as soon as the necessary legal steps could be taken, a royal charter was issued constituting the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts.

Under this name the archbishop of Canterbury and ninety others were incorporated and empowered to receive and hold lands and other forms of property and use the same for the purposes of the society. For the execution of their trust they were to hold yearly meetings for the election of officers, though the charter itself provided that the archbishop of Canterbury should be the first president. After the society had been organized business meetings should be held monthly or oftener, as need should require, and at these meetings members might be added to the corporation. For the proper transaction of business a quorum of seven, together with the president or one of the vice presidents, must be present. At these meetings by-laws could be passed and leases executed, and fit persons appointed to take subscriptions and receive contributions. Yearly the society should account in writing to the lord chancellor, the lord keeper or the justices of king's bench and common pleas for the money received and expended.¹ Under these simple forms, the work of this important missionary society was carried on.

Meetings of the Society began June 27, 1701.² The archbishop of Canterbury was usually chosen president, and might be regarded as its natural, if not almost its ex officio, head. A board of vice presidents was annually chosen. In the absence of the archbishop—which was frequent—the bishop of London or some other bishop presided. Certain others of the clergy—bishops, archdeacons or deans—together with a varying number of lay members, made up the list of those who usually attended the meetings of the Society. The usual places of meeting were at the Cockpit or at the archbishop's library at St. Martin's in the Fields. The Society had from early in its history a standing committee which met weekly at St. Paul's Chapter House and, with a quorum of five—later of three—read and considered all the letters from the missionaries, officials and others in the colonies and also the replies which should be made to them. The secretary, like the holder of the same office for the board of trade, was the routine executive officer of the committee and of the Society and became one of its chief experts. At first letters were not infrequently read in full before the Society, but later, as correspondence became more voluminous, only those which were of exceptional importance were read, while abstracts were made and submitted of the rest.

¹ The charter is printed in Humphreys' volume.

² Ms. Journal and Correspondence of the Society; Pascoe, Two Hundred Years of the S. P. G.; Hawkins, Historical Notices of Missions of the Church of England in the North American Colonies; Humphreys, op. cit.; Dalcho, History of the Church in South Carolina; Perry op. cit., etc.

There was a considerable lay element in the Society. New members were from time to time admitted, some being men who were prominent in colonial affairs—as Nicholson, Dudley, Lewis Morris, Heathcote, Hunter, Nicholas Trott and others. It was proposed to make the lord mayor and aldermen of London members, but that does not seem to have been done. A number of merchants were members, among them being Micajah Perry. Benefactions were specially sought from merchants, and by preference from those who were engaged in the plantation trade. At the close of 1704, in recognition of the value of his services as a missionary, George Keith was made a member of the Society.

Dr. Bray was often present at early meetings of the Society and was then its agent in soliciting contributions in England. Governors were requested to solicit aid in their colonies. The crown allowed £20 each to ministers on going to the plantations. They also received £15 from the Society for the purchase of books from a list prescribed by it, and an annual salary of £50 from the same source. The audit of the Society's accounts, in February, 1707/8, showed that its yearly income was £763 and its regular expenses £1285; since the previous June £617 had been expended from its capital stock. This shows not only how small were its resources when compared with sums similarly expended in our own day, but how continuous was the need of subscriptions. In 1715 it was stated that expenses had exceeded income. For the year 1709–10 the income of the Society was £1251. Soon after that they had to resort to retrenchment and to agree not to send more missionaries, increase salaries or give gratuities until the debts of the Society were paid. This, when taken into connection with the parsimony of the colonists, furnishes the explanation of the oft-repeated complaints of the missionaries concerning the meagreness of their support.

One would naturally infer that the policy of the Society was determined in the main by its clerical members. The impression which one gets from reading its journal is that in really important matters the will of the primate and of the bishop of London was decisive, receiving as it did of course the assent of the other clergymen and bishops. This impression is strengthened by the regulation that all orders and minutes of the Society must be laid before the archbishop and the bishop of London. But the Society, of course, had to wait humbly and patiently on the will of the government and of the monarch. With a reserve and submissiveness which can almost be felt it waited on the archbishop and he on the king or queen and government for indications of their purposes or light on what they thought possible or impossible. This appears clearly in the history of the question of the colonial episcopate. Letters were occasionally interchanged with the board of trade or secretary of state. Written representations were occasionally sent to the monarch or to the ministry, for example, to stop the sale of liquor to the Indians, that missionaries among the Iroquois and the Palatines should be supported by the king, that the garrison at Albany should be supplied with a resident minister, that oppressive legislation should be disallowed. Colonial governors were similarly applied to for encouragement and support.

The first important measure of the Society was the dispatch of Keith and Gordon as special missionaries on a preaching tour through the colonies.¹ They crossed the ocean in 1702, on the same vessel which brought Joseph Dudley to his governorship in Massachusetts and Lewis Morris back from his negotiations concerning the surrender of government by the New Jersey proprietors. John Talbot was chaplain of the ship. Keith gave a very favorable account of the voyage, of the civilities of Dudley and Morris, of the daily celebration of divine worship, and of good conversation, "like a college," in the cabin. Gordon died soon after they reached America, and Talbot, as the result of the acquaintance made on ship board, became Keith's companion. In most respects this was a fortunate choice, for Talbot was a man of energy and ability, an enthusiast in the cause of the Church. He became also an ardent admirer and supporter of Keith.¹ In the course of two years Keith travelled twice through the colonies from New Hampshire to North Carolina, preaching to dissenters, and especially to Quakers, wherever he found an opportunity. For controversy with them he was especially qualified, not only by his general ability as a speaker, but by his knowledge of their tenets, as he had only recently separated from their fellowship. The journeyings of Keith and Talbot suggest in a superficial way the later and more profound Wesleyan movement and the great preaching tours of Whitefield. The preaching of Keith and Talbot was an appropriate introduction to the work of the new missionary society and the information which was given in their letters and reports furnished a basis on which to begin operations.

¹ See Keith's Journal, in Colls. of Prot. Episcopal Hist. Soc.; Hawkins, op cit.; Hills, History of the Church in Burlington, New Jersey.

Prominent Anglican laymen resident in the colonies, like Caleb Heathcote and Lewis Morris, and particularly Governor Francis Nicholson, gave much information orally or in writing. The information also which came from the governors to the board of trade might be at the service of the society. But, like the board of trade, it was continuously in correspondence with its missionaries abroad and it was chiefly their letters which kept it informed and furnished the staple of its business. In the appointment of missionaries—who held their positions during pleasure—the usual precautions were taken to secure good men, inquiries of course being confined within Anglican circles and regard being always had to orthodoxy, as well as to morals and general ability. Candidates were required to preach before members of the Society before they received appointment. Appointees were assigned by the Society to their special fields of work and were not to remove or return home without its consent. The rule of the Society was not to send a missionary to a place unless the communicants there had shown their ability and inclination to contribute toward his support.

As to the scope of the work, the Society in 1702 stated its purpose to be, “to settle the State of Religion as well as may be among our own people there, . . . and then to proceed in the best methods they can towards the Conversion of the natives.”¹ In addition to the Indians, work among the negroes was undertaken by some of the missionaries in the south, where the opposition of the planters was not so strong as to prevent it, and by schoolmasters, notably Elias Neau, in New York. In 1710 it was resolved by the Society that the branch of its design which related to the conversion of the heathen and infidels ought to be prosecuted preferably to all others. In 1715 more than one half of its income was expended for missionary work among the Indians of New York.² A missionary was also maintained among the Palatines while they were on the Hudson and later at Schoharie. Among the whites, the field of its operations was in those colonies where the Church was not established or where dissenters were largely in the majority, and its purpose was really two-fold. It was to provide spiritual instruction for the scattered people who were already Anglicans and give them a church organization, and in connection therewith to add to their numbers as many as possible from non-religionists and dissenters. This was properly and inevitably the character of such work. It was frankly sectarian, as such enterprises have almost always been, though its purpose was generally benevolent, as this word was understood at the time. The dissenters, opponents of the movement, of course viewed it from the other angle and spoke of it with a different emphasis. To them it bore the aspect of interference and offensive partisanship. In his correspondence Penn condemned much of the activity of Anglicans in his province as “impertinent and provoking.” “They came here poor and are so still, yet have got their bread and some of them estates, and cannot be satisfied to do so; but must in the pulpit inveigh against our principles, . . . as if . . . they would stir up their people against those whose tenderness admits them into shares in the administration to turn them out.” After stating that this activity was due in large measure to the incitement of Nicholson and a few about him, Penn continued: “We cannot yet be so self-denying as to let those that had no part of the heat of the day, not one third of the number, and not one fourth of the estate, and not one tenth of the trouble and labour, should give laws to us and make us dissenters and worse than that in our own country."¹

¹ Many of Talbot's letters are printed in the volumes just referred to.

¹ Humphreys, 23; Pascoe, 7-8.

² Mss. of the Society.

In nearly all of the colonies dissenters were already in possession of the ground and regarded the appearance of Anglican missionaries as an intrusion. Being themselves ardent partisans, they usually put upon this the worst possible interpretation and affirmed that the chief purpose of the Society was propagandism, the winning of proselytes from other faiths. The connection between the Society and the British government, and its support by the royal officials in the colonies gave to its policy a political coloring and made it easy to designate it as one phase of the general movement of the time toward stronger imperial influence and control over the colonies. When, as we shall see, the Society began and continued an aggressive campaign far and wide in dissenting communities and made inroads, and especially when this occurred in New England, the development of controversies was unavoidable, with charges of sinister motives on both sides. Under such stress purposes somewhat changed and stiffened and objects were tacitly, if not expressly, pursued, which would never have been acknowledged at the inception of the movement. There was therefore truth in both conceptions, of the purpose of the Society, though both were exaggerated and policies doubtless underwent development.

Naturally it was in New England that the strongest opposition to Anglican propaganda appeared. As usual, this was led by the Mathers, while Sewall entered mournful comments in his diary. The fact that Keith and Talbot appeared in company with Dudley gave added point to their criticisms. Keith officiated as the clergyman at Dudley's inauguration. While the new governor retained his membership in the church at Roxbury, which he had joined in his youth, he was enrolled among the vestrymen of "Queen's Chapel," as it was now called, and with Povey, the lieutenant governor, frequently if not regularly attended service there, thus giving a sort of official recognition to this body as the favorite of the administration.² The fact that Dudley had prepared for the use of the Society a statement of the population of the different colonies and an estimate of the prospects of the Church for growth in them indicates his interest in its fortunes generally. Keith was kindly received by Myles and Bridge, the two clergymen of the chapel and preached there on the Sunday following Dudley's inauguration. The object of this sermon—which was afterwards printed—was to “heal up the breach if possible” between the Church and the various dissenting sects and to apologize for the censures which he had passed upon her while he was still a Quaker. Conformity, obedience to superiors and the duty of using set forms in prayer were among the six “good rules in Divinity” which Keith recommended as means to the end he had in view. “Whoever denies or disowns her (the Church of England),” he declared, “as too many do of various sorts, do show themselves to be undutiful Children, unless they can prove her to be degenerate, which I am well persuaded they can never do.”

¹ Penn to Harley, 14 Rep. of Historical Mss. Com., app. 4, p. 32.

² Foote, Annals of King's Chapel, I, 151.

In 1688 Keith, in his earlier capacity as a Quaker preacher, had visited Boston and denounced the clergy there in the severe prophetic style,¹ which still survived among the disciples of George Fox. James Allen, Joshua Moody, Samuel Willard and Cotton Mather had been expressly named among those “called preachers in Boston” whom Keith attacked. Their reply was: “Having received a blasphemous and heretical paper, subscribed by one George Keith, our answer to it and him is; if he desires conference to instruct us, let him give us his arguments in writing as well as his assertions; if to inform himself, let him write his doubts; if to cavil and disturb the peace of our churches (which we have cause to suspect) we have neither list nor liscence to attend his motions. If he would have a public audience, let him print; if a private discourse, though he may know where we dwell, yet we forget not what the Apostle John saith, Epis. 2, 10th verse.”² The spirit in which Keith replied may be inferred from the title of the next publication: “A brief answer to some gross abuses, lies and slanders, published some years ago by

¹ Perry, Hist. of Am. Episcopal Church, I, 208.

² “If there come any unto you and bring not this doctrine, receive him not into your house, neither bid him God speed.”

Increase Mather, late teacher of a church in Boston, in New England, in his book called 'An Essay for the recording of Illustrious Providences,' etc., and by Nath. Morton, in his book called 'New England's Memorial.' "

In 1689 Increase Mather had published a pamphlet entitled, "A Brief Discourse Concerning the unlawfulness of the Common Prayer Worship, and of Laying the Hand on and Kissing the Booke in Swearing." This was the first blast from the trumpet of the leading divine of New England against the episcopal innovations which had been set up there by Randolph, Andros and their associates. He pronounced the ceremonies and worship prescribed in the Book of Common Prayer to be popish and heathenish, declaring that they could not be practiced without sin. "In this Age of Light!" he said, "it would in me, (and all others so educated and instructed as I have been) appear to be a great Apostacy should I in the least countenance or comply with the Common Prayer worship." The following year, in an election sermon before the general court, Cotton Mather had again coupled the English Church with the Roman and in the spirit, not of Francis Higginson when he came to Salem, but of the later Puritans when they had become firmly established in New England. He warned his hearers against the "mystical Babylon" which was "just entering into the vintage" and would cause "horrible and fiery plagues to impend over the Heads of those that shall have the Superstitions of Popery polluting them." "Could I speak with a voice as loud as the Last Trumpet, I should not fear to tell you, the God of your Fathers will blast the Worldly Wisdom which counts it a conveniency for us to Dissemble our Non Conformity to what ever vain Worship has nothing but the Tradition of men to Warrant it."¹

These utterances, both with reference to Keith as a Quaker and also to the English Church, made it certain that his reappearance as a convert to the Church and as an aggressive defender of its claims would arouse the Mathers. This it did, and the elder Mather at once replied to Keith's sermons in a pamphlet in which, though using a form of speech more dignified and restrained than was customary with his son, he declared that the adherents of the English Church were dissenters in New England and reminded Keith that a penitent acknowledgment of the blasphemies he had uttered as a Quaker would have furnished better evidence of the sincerity of his conversion. "For him who has been as great a Schismatic as any Donatist in the world now to insinuate that all the holy churches of Nonconformists are Schismatics, . . . deserves severe reproof." So sure was Mather that the churches of New England were built on the true biblical foundation that it was to be hoped that, though an hundred Keiths should come to seduce them, they would not forsake the pure religion which had been left to them by their fathers. There could be no doubt that these were the sentiments of the vast majority of Puritan New Englanders and that the Mathers correctly voiced their opinions upon the subject of episcopacy. In reply to Keith they sounded the first note in a controversy which was to last as long as the connection with England continued. The entire past of New England made it certain that the Church would there meet its strongest opposition. Elsewhere in the colonies it had secured a foothold or even a leading position with little or no difficulty. In New England it must build from the smallest and weakest beginnings and, outside of Rhode Island, must count on the opposition of the colony governments and of the mass of the population. In Massachusetts it had the support of a group of royal officials, small in numbers, but considerable in influence, and of tendencies which were manifest in the practice of the half-way covenant and in the so-called spirit of Arminianism that was abroad told in its favor.

¹ Pubs. of Prince Soc.; Slafter, John Checkley, I, 22 et seq.

Of the fact that zealots like Keith and Talbot, backed by politicians of the not too exalted type represented by Nicholson and Cornbury, found their chief reward from the work of propagandism not in the moral improvement of their hearers, but in such assaults as they could make upon rival sects, their writings and conduct leave no room for doubt.¹ We may not admire the dogmatism and intolerance of the Mathers and of the New England clergy generally, but in dignity and power of utterance, their superiority is evident, when compared with nearly all the early defenders of Anglicanism in the colonies. In the presence of such men as Keith and Talbot, the New England churches would have been blind had they not seen that they were the chief object of attack and that the healing of the schism in the English Church which now had lasted more than a century, rather than the preaching of the gospel to the destitute, was the object of these so called missionary journeys.

¹ See Keith's Journal and letters, together with those of Talbot, which are printed in Colls. of Prot. Episcopal Hist. Soc., I; Reed, Church and State in Mass., 152 et seq., University of Ill. Studies, III.

The Quakers also, even more than the Independents, were objects of Keith's attention. Wherever he found their meetings in session, from New Hampshire to the Carolinas, Keith made it a point, if possible, to attend, to interrupt their services, to argue against their doctrines and engage in noisy altercations with Quaker preachers and others who were present. In Rhode Island conspicuous instances of this form of procedure occurred. The ultra-controversial spirit raged there even more fiercely than it had done in the same places when Roger Williams held his famous arguments with the Quakers. According to Talbot, none of the Quakers were able to answer Keith, for he, better than all others, knew "the Depths of Satan within them and all the Doublings and Windings of the Snake in the Grass." On the suggestion of Bray special attention was paid to Rhode Island and to the nearby towns where Quakers were numerous. Because of the strength of Quaker opposition and also of the system of religious freedom which existed there, Rhode Island was considered a favorable field in which to station Anglican missionaries. In Pennsylvania also the battle raged, though in the other colonies the attitude of the dissenters seemed more conciliatory. The Keithian Quakers everywhere were naturally more inclined to listen to their former leader, though he was sometimes called upon to explain the inconsistencies in his past conduct. Upon the name of William Penn himself, Talbot in particular poured out the vials of his wrath, denouncing him as a greater Antichrist than Julian the Apostate and inquiring who was defender of the faith when this "head-Heretick" was made governor and proprietor of a province. So the aggressive campaign went on during the reign of Anne, and whatever comfortable and assuring words might be spoken about it at the meetings of the Society or in other clerical circles in England, in many parts of the colonies it was simply plunging communities more deeply than ever into the slough of sectarian polemics.

It was on the submission of letters by Bray and consultation with Keith that it was decided to send a missionary to Rhode Island. In response to a letter from Vesey it was resolved to send six missionaries to New York, and a letter from Pennsylvania occasioned the designation of three to service in that province. One was to be sent to North Carolina. The securing by purchase or gift of an estate of land either in Maryland or Virginia was discussed before the end of 1702. Letters from Keith, while he was on his missionary journeys, probably led to the formation of a plan for founding a mission among the Iroquois, to offset the influence of the Jesuits. In April, 1703, an order in council to that effect was issued, and the board of trade was to be informed of this action. It was in this connection that Rev. Godfrey Dellius comes into view again after his expulsion by Bellomont from New York for complicity in land frauds. He was now living in the Netherlands. Dudley had made a motion in the Society concerning him and Dellius had repeatedly written to it seeking a new appointment for work among the Indians and setting forth his knowledge of the Mohawk tongue and his acquaintance with their affairs. In the spring of 1704 Robert Livingston, then in London, gave encouragement to the work of Lydius among the Indians and the Society presently dropped its correspondence with Dellius.

In 1705 an inquiry was made into the status and work of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in New England,¹ its charter was examined and Sir William Ashurst, its president, wrote them about its revenue and funds. A letter was then ordered prepared by Dudley, the governor of Massachusetts, to the Episcopal clergy in New England, to encourage sending over young students who were inclined to be ordained and become missionaries.²

In the winter of 1705/6 Rev. Samuel Thomas, from South

¹ Osgood, American Colonies in the 17th Century, III, 151.

² This was a work in which Dr. Samuel Johnson a quarter of a century later became very deeply concerned in Connecticut.

Carolina, was in London and repeatedly appeared before the Society. He presented a valuable memorial on the state of the Church in his province and told how poorly he had been supported by the governor, Sir Nathaniel Johnson, and the people. It was apparently from Thomas that the Society first learned of the clause in the South Carolina act which provided that ministers should be removed by lay commissioners on complaint of the inhabitants. During the discussion which arose over this subject Thomas was called on for information. Complaints against him were later presented by Rev. Edward Marston and Colonel Smith, but Marston's reputation was soon so wrecked that nothing came of this.

The starting of the mission at Stratford, Connecticut, appears in this form in the journal of the Society. In September, 1707, two letters from Heathcote were read and also a clause from the laws of Connecticut.¹ Evans, the missionary at Philadelphia, had been questioned about the matter, and when the subject was taken up again, the bishop of London said he had received an address from some inhabitants of Connecticut asking that Anglican worship be set up among them. But it was voted to send out no more missionaries while the finances of the Society continued in their present state. The following March the question of retaining Honeyman in Rhode Island, against whom charges had been made, came up and Colonel Nicholson, then in London, offered £30 for his support for a year, until his case could be fully investigated. This was accepted. Later, while stating to the committee the great need of sending a missionary to Connecticut, Nicholson said that, if the Society would send one to that colony, he would increase his former gift to fifty guineas. At a later meeting, when Nicholson was present, the committee reported in favor of accepting this offer. A paper entitled "The State of the Church in Connecticut," was read; Evans gave a further account of the subject, and the question was referred back to the committee. At the same time Lord Lovelace, who was soon to go out as governor to New York, was admitted to membership in the Society. The committee reported that a missionary was greatly needed in Connecticut and that the order in council which had vetoed its law concerning Quakers did not include its law entitled "ecclesiastical," which was made use of against the Church. It also recommended that Rev. George Muirson, of Rye, be the appointee, if any one was sent. The treasurer was appealed to and he said there was too much reason to think that Moore and Brooke had been lost on their voyage to England — which proved true — and, if so, that £200 in salaries would be set free. Thereupon it was voted to transfer Muirson from Rye to Stratford, and the mission was established from which were finally to proceed more important results than from any other similar act of the Church in the colonies.

¹ Hawks and Perry, Church of Connecticut, I, 19, 26.

It was through the influence of Heathcote, Cornbury and Vesey, that Muirson was selected for this work, and it marks the beginning of a reaction on the part of New York upon western Connecticut which was destined to be permanent and far reaching. Muirson had been a schoolmaster at Albany and in New York and by his devotion, tact and ability had recommended himself to his superiors and, after being admitted to orders, was soon instructed with responsible missionary work. From his parish at Rye he and Heathcote had tested the spirit and needs of nearby towns in Connecticut by repeated visits before it was resolved, if possible, to secure the establishment of a mission there. The number of acknowledged Anglicans was few and they were scattered, though with the presence of a clergyman and stated services, accompanied with the baptism of children and the dissemination of literature, the number of communicants was increased. But the opposition which these early efforts met with was determined and led to much genuine persecution. A single quotation from Muirson's letters will indicate its nature.¹ "Though every Churchman in that Colony pays his rate for the building and repairing their meeting-houses, yet they are so maliciously set against us, that they deny us the use of them, though on week days. They tell our people that they will not suffer the house of God to be defiled with idolatrous worship and superstitious ceremonies. . . . They say the sign of the cross is the mark of the beast and the sign of the devil, and that those who receive it are given to the devil. And when our people complain to their magistrates of the persons who thus speak, they will not so much as sign a warrant to apprehend them, nor reprove them for their offence." Muirson and Heathcote had already been warned of the provisions of Connecticut law for securing uniformity of worship and of the intention of the local magistrates to enforce them.¹ It was not, however, until the close of 1709, after Muirson's premature death, that refusal to pay the taxes levied for the support of congregational or presbyterian worship, had become so evident as to lead to the fining and imprisonment of offenders. This began at Stratford and extended to other towns, becoming the accepted policy of the Connecticut government, regularly enforced wherever Anglicans appeared in sufficient strength to begin or demand services of their own and to separate themselves fully from the established churches. In some cases, estates were to a large extent confiscated and people were forced by their sufferings to leave the colony. In this way the progress of the Church was checked and its supporters found themselves facing a long and bitter conflict.

¹ Conn. Church Docs. I, 30.

The demand for missionaries soon became greater than the supply, but during the first fifteen years of its existence the Society established missions at Newbury, Marblehead and Braintree in Massachusetts; Newport and Narragansett (Kingston) in Rhode Island; Rye, New Rochelle, Westchester, Jamaica, Hempstead, Richmond and Albany in New York; Burlington, Amboy and Elizabethtown in New Jersey; Chester, Oxford and Radnor in Pennsylvania; Newcastle and Dover in the counties on the Delaware; Charlestown, Goose Creek, St. John's, St. Bartholomew's, St. Paul's, St. Andrew's, and St. Thomas' parishes in South Carolina. Assistants were also provided for King's Chapel in Boston, for Trinity Church in New York and for Christ Church in Philadelphia. Elias Neau was appointed a catechist and schoolmaster for the negroes in New York City. A mission was established at Fort Hunter among the Mohawks, and a minister was stationed among the Palatines. In South Carolina some of the most efficient work was done, so that a commissary was sent there after the Church was established; though the Society continued to send ministers there throughout the colonial period.

¹ Ibid., 23, 42.

From time to time the need of one or more bishops for the colonies was impressed upon the Society.¹ The demand came from the Anglican clergy in the colonies and was urged by the Society, partly as a reflection of these demands. Its efforts to secure colonial bishops were especially prominent for some fifteen years after its founding. Then they ceased for a generation, because of the unsympathetic attitude of the government. So strong was the interest of Archbishop Tenison in a colonial episcopate, that on his death he left £1000 for the endowment of such an office. The sympathies of Queen Anne were strong in favor of the same policy. In the same direction tended also the strong High Church and Tory reaction of the later years of her reign. There was great justice in this demand, as has been made clear by what was said concerning the commissaries. Ordination, confirmation, consecration of churches, settlement of disputes between clergymen, churches and factions, the enforcement of discipline, general supervision and leadership in affairs of the Church at large—for all these and more the presence of a bishop was absolutely necessary or very advantageous for the Church. The office was necessary to its complete constitution. At the close of 1704 the standing committee reported to the Society that it had prepared a statement of the case in favor of suffragan bishops in the colonies, and it had been delivered to the two archbishops and the bishop of London, to be laid before the queen. More than six months later this matter was mentioned again, but no action was taken.

Meantime, in letters from the colonies the missionaries and laymen, like Heathcote, Morris, Nicholson and, later, Hunter, expressed in no uncertain terms the need of a bishop and their desire that one should be sent.² Moore wrote that the clergy were unanimous in their desire for a suffragan, and of the substantial truth of this there is no reason to doubt. Heathcote expressed the opinion that, if one were sent, many graduates of Harvard College would conform and become Anglican ministers, while his statements of the need of the churches for prompt action in this matter were many and urgent. The zealous Talbot exceeded all others in the number and force of his appeals. In 1703, after his second missionary journey with Keith, he enlarged on the characteristics of the dissenting sects and on the completeness — from their own point of view — of their polity. "But," he continued, "the poor Church has nobody upon the spot to comfort or confirm her children." Several who were willing to become ministers fell back into "the herd of dissenters" rather than go so far as to England for orders. "Is it not strange," he exclaimed in 1709, "that so many islands should be inhabited with Protestants, so many provinces planted by them. . . . But of all the kings, princes and governors, all the bishops and archbishops that have been since the Reformation, they never sent anybody here to propagate the Gospel—I say to propagate it by imparting some spiritual gift by ordination or confirmation?"¹ The Pennsylvania clergy and a convention of missionaries who were brought together at Burlington, New Jersey, in 1705 as a result of the activity of Nicholson, petitioned the Society for bishops. In 1706 Talbot visited England to support the cause in person.²

¹ Cross, op. cit., 88 et seq.; also all the other standard works on the history of the American Episcopal Church.

² Ms. Journal and Correspondence of the S. P. G.

In 1707 Archbishop Tenison laid the matter before the queen,³ and she directed him to submit a plan. But when the question was brought up in the Society, it was voted to postpone it till more bishops were present. It was realized that the plan would be received with alarm and opposition in the colonies, not alone by the dissenters, but by the laity of the Church, because a bishop would restrict the control they had over their pastors and also might reprove them for their low morals.⁴ The opinion was expressed that, when a bishop should be sent, it should be a suffragan, as being less offensive and easier to change than one of full rank. In June,

¹ Hawkins, 144, 376 et seq.

² Colls. of Prot. Epis. Hist. Soc. I, 58 et seq.

³ Ms. Journal of S. P. G.

⁴ See an unsigned set of observations, probably by the bishop of London, under date of 1707, N. Y. Col. Docs. V, 29. Evans, of Philadelphia, in a memorial on the state of the Church in Pennsylvania, had enlarged on the low morals among the colonists and on the need of a bishop to restrain this, as well as for administrative reasons; Mss. of S. P. G.; Hazard, Pa. Register, III, 337; Cross, op. cit., 95.

1709, the subject was again brought up by the bishop of London, who stated to the Society the great inconveniences that arose from the lack of a bishop in the plantations. But it was moved that, until further steps could be taken, a commissary be sent. So important was the question considered that it was postponed until the archbishop could be present. On July 15 he was present, and he thought the matter had better be put off until the bishops had returned from the country, the entry being made in such form as to show that the subject was a delicate one, to be spoken of very softly.

In April, 1710, after considering conflicts and irregularities in the colonies, and having the needs of the Indians brought forcibly before it by the presence of Schuyler and his Iroquois, the committee reported resolutions reached at a meeting which the archbishop had desired to be held at Lambeth, that the Society could not well carry on the various branches of its work without a bishop, that the early establishment of a French bishop at Quebec appeared to have been a great cause of the successful extension of Catholicism among the Indians, and that this and the other needs of the work be embodied in a representation to the queen, to be drawn by the bishop of Salisbury, Gilbert Burnet, and the bishop of Norwich. The latter then produced a draft of a representation, which was approved and was delivered to the archbishop to be presented to the queen.¹ Though these steps were taken and rumors had already been circulated that Dean Swift was to be sent as a bishop to Virginia, nothing came of it.

In January, 1711, the archbishop of York desired that the proposal to send bishops to the colonies be submitted to Convocation, but in the absence of the bishop of London the motion was dropped. So encouraging, however, seemed at this time the prospect of a colonial episcopate that negotiations were begun for the purchase of a house at Burlington, New Jersey, which was intended for an Episcopal residence. In the fall of 1712 Governor Hunter, on behalf of the Society, closed the bargain for the house, its price being £602.² In this same year a bill was drafted, to be offered in parliament, for the establishment of bishops and bishoprics in America. Renewed representations to the queen were so successful that, had it not been for her sudden death, the object might have been at once attained. But with the accession of the Hanoverians, as events proved, the cause received such a set-back that, in the view of the government, it never afterwards reached the stage of a practical issue.

¹ The four Indians were then called in and the resolutions were read to them.

² Hills, op. cit., 106; Ms. Correspondence of the S. P. G.

CHAPTER XVIII

CULMINATION OF THE LEISLERIAN CONFLICT. MISGOVERNMENT OF LORD CORNBURY IN NEW YORK AND NEW JERSEY

THE earl of Bellomont died March 5, 1700/1. The four Leislerian councillors, Weaver, De Peyster, Staats and Walters, were in town and in an hour after the death of the governor they met in council.¹ Lieutenant Governor Nanfan was then in Barbadoes or on his way home from the West Indies. William Smith, acting chief justice² and the senior councillor and also one of the aristocrats whose large estates and imperfect knowledge of the law had exposed him to Bellomont's criticism, was on Long Island, seventy miles away. Schuyler and Livingston were in Albany. The peace of the province and the continuance of government, including of course the ascendancy of the Leislerians must be at once provided for. The four councillors issued a proclamation which was ordered to be published in the counties, confirming all officers, civil and military in their places. Expresses were sent to the absent councillors announcing Bellomont's death and desiring their attendance in council. De Peyster, being the eldest councillor present, should act as president till the arrival of Nanfan or Smith. Letters were written to the lords of trade and to Secretary Vernon, stating what had occurred, and asking that Champante might be continued in his position as agent for the province and that, if a chief justice and attorney general should be appointed, owing to the financial straits of New York, they might be paid out of the royal revenues. Champante was asked to use his influence to have good Leislerians put into the council.³

¹ Ex. C. Min. The record was surrounded by mourning lines. It was among the volumes destroyed in the Albany fire. N. Y. Col. Docs. IV, 850. Cal. St. P. Col. 1701, p. 108 et seq., 119.

² Bellomont had suspended Smith from this office on Dec. 25, 1700, but had not informed him of it. So Smith continued to serve without knowing this, until after Bellomont's death and the arrival of Atwood. Ex. C. Min. June 12, 1702.

³ Cal. St. P. Col., 1701, p. 121.

On March 11 Smith arrived. Two days later a meeting of the council was held, over which he presided.¹ There was no earlier precedent, unless the practice of other colonies was inquired into, for the situation in which New York now found herself.² As the Leislerian councillors would not at first commit themselves, Smith told them that he thought he was entitled to convene, prorogue and dissolve the assemblies and to use the power of veto, and that without him the council could not do business; and finally that outside of the council he should be at the head of the executive. The first meeting with Smith occurred on the 13th and then the Leislerian members came forward with a resolution that the majority should call a council meeting and determine the policy of the government in all things, and if Smith did not choose to act with them on that basis, they would go on without him. Smith presented his view which proved to be the correct one;—but as it was seen by him and his supporters outside, that a refusal to serve was precisely what the Leislerians desired, he added that he would acquiesce and preside under the conditions they specified with a protest for the saving of his rights.

In 1707,³ because of disputes which had arisen in several colonies over this question, the crown issued a special instruction to the effect that, on the death or absence of the governor, the eldest councillor then in the province should undertake the administration of the government and execute the powers conveyed by the commission and instructions of the governor as the governor would do if he were present. The effect of this was to concentrate authority more definitely in the hands of the president and to remove the indefiniteness in the wording of the previous instruction. It was in line with the claim which had been set up by Smith and made for efficient government, though the New York council correctly interpreted its rights under Bellomont's commission.

¹ Docs. 857; Ex. C. Min.; Cal. St. P. Col., 1701, pp. 125, 186 et seq.

² Bellomont's commission provided that, in the event which had happened, the council should take charge of the government, and the eldest councillor should act as president with such powers as had been held by presidents in New York, or other provinces. N. Y. Col. Docs. IV, 272. The board of trade seems to have agreed with Weaver and his associates in their interpretation of this clause. Cal. St. P. Col., 1701, p. 429.

³ N. Y. Col. Docs. V, pp. 3, 5; C. O. 5/210, May 3, 1707.

The next question was, whether the assembly should meet on April 2, the date to which it had been prorogued and it was decided that it should do so, Smith alone dissenting.¹ His reason, which was submitted in writing, was that it was possible that the assembly had legally been dissolved by Lord Bellomont's death, especially as there would be no commander-in-chief to meet it, as was required by the writ and if it should sit, the negative voice would be lost, since the council as a whole could not make use of it. He also called their attention to the order which had been sent to the governors the previous year, that when they were under presidents and councils only such laws should be passed as were immediately necessary for the peace and welfare of the provinces. But in a heated argument the Leislerians maintained that a session was necessary and finally carried it by a majority of one. After protesting at length, Smith, along with the rest, signed the call for the assembly. Smith then returned to his home for a few days on private business.

While he was away Schuyler and Livingston arrived in town, but, though repeatedly notified of its meetings, they declined to attend the council until Smith's return.² The members were also pledging their private credit for the support of the forces, and the two Albany councillors declined to be drawn further into such entanglements. Weaver and De Peyster advanced money for this purpose.

Eleven members of the assembly met on the 2nd of April. Two days later a quorum was present, though the entire membership from two counties was absent till several days later. On the 8th Smith presented a statement concerning the assembly as well as the existing administration of the government, but the majority refused to allow it entered on the minutes.³ The next day they charged Smith with delaying the business of the assembly and claiming larger powers than he was entitled to. They said that his position was merely that of presiding officer of the upper house and the council had charge of the government. To this Smith replied.⁴

¹ Cal. St. P. Col., 1701, pp. 127, 187, 193, 194, 196.

² Ibid., 193.

³ Ex. C. Min.

⁴ These papers are in inclosures. Cal. St. P. Col., 1701, p. 194 et seq.

After a brief adjournment, the assembly came together again on the 14th. Then the four councillors gave reasons in elaborate form why the assembly should proceed to business with the council as it was then organized.¹ The fort at Onondaga must be built, they said, preparations must be made for an Indian conference and provision for the payment of the troops. The forts at Albany and Schenectady greatly needed repair or rebuilding and the mast timber must be sent to England. Smith, they declared, was hindering them from doing so by claiming exorbitant powers. This paper was sent to the assembly and copies of it also to the absent members of the council. It was equivalent to a program of business and was so accepted by the assembly and they then proceeded with the session in agreement with the majority of the council,² though Smith states that it was only by a bare majority vote. The assembly declared that the administration of government was in the council, over which the eldest councillor should preside, and not in any single councillor. Five members of the house, all of whom but one were from Queens and Suffolk counties and were friends of Smith, presented a paper in opposition to this. A committee reported that this was a disloyal act and Matthew Howell, one of its signers, was expelled.

In the statement of their side of the case, which Smith, Schuyler and Livingston sent to England, they charged Weaver with being chiefly responsible for what had occurred.³ They deplored the fact that, some little time before Bello-mont's death, he had been appointed a member of the council. They described him as a stranger, a person of turbulent and violent spirit, a partisan who had been the sole manager of the debates in the council, and that with heat and clamor; that during the short time he had been collector he had imposed requirements on the merchants which were not known in other colonies and, when they complained, had told them that the more he made them protest the better the commissioners of the customs would like him. The writers begged that some steps might be taken in England to abate the heats and animosities by which New York was distressed.

¹ Ibid., 197.

² Ass. J. I, 110.

³ Docs. p. 861, et seq. Cal. St. P. Col., 1701, p. 190.

Bayard had already written to Philip Meadows that party spirit was hot, the assembly packed, that men of the meanest origin, most of them Dutch, were in all the offices, that appropriations to pay Leisler's debts and other extravagant measures might be expected.¹ To Bellomont a petition had been presented for an allowance of £2700 to the Leisler family. According to Bayard's view, the removal of Smith from the office of chief justice and the appointment of De Peyster to that position shortly before Bellomont's death, was an early preliminary to measures like the above.² He also states that it was planned that Smith, Schuyler and Livingston should be suspended from the council, but that was prevented by the sudden death of the earl. Bayard inclosed in his letter a considerable list of persons on the other side who were suitable to receive appointment.

The assembly resolved that the building of the fort at Onondaga be suspended until Nanfan's return. Stephen Van Cortlandt, who since the removal of Brooke had been collector and receiver general, had recently died. His widow now refused to surrender his books of accounts to the Leislerians who were in control of the government,³ and so nothing but confused and fragmentary accounts could be found. A report on the subject was submitted to the house, but no decisive action was taken at this time. On April 19, when Smith retired to his country estate and Livingston declared that he would not cooperate with the council until Smith's return, that body resolved that it could not act without Smith, and so the two houses adjourned till June.

On May 19 Nanfan made his first appearance at council.⁴ This brought the unusual situation in that body to an end. It meant the complete ascendancy to the Leislerians, at least in the executive and upper house, for the lieutenant governor identified himself fully with them. Because of the activity of the French, Indian affairs occupied much of Nanfan's

¹ Docs. p. 848 (Mar. 8); Cal. St. P. Col., 1701, p. 115.

² De Peyster declined to act as justice till some lawyer came from England to preside. Case of Atwood, p. 250. It was known or supposed at that time that a chief justice and attorney general were soon to be sent from England.

³ This trouble with the "lady mayoress" had begun before Bellomont's death. Cal. St. P. Col., 1701, 213.

⁴ Ex. C. Min. Cal. St. P. Col., 1701, p. 254.

attention and it was necessary for him to visit Albany early in July for a conference. But, on June 1, the council voted that, for the peace and welfare of the province, it was necessary to dissolve the existing assembly and that a new one should be elected to meet on the first Tuesday in August.¹ Nanfan also wrote that from the journal he had found the disputes in the house over the legality of their session to have been so heated that it was impossible to think of bringing them again to cooperate in that body. After the dissolution a warning was issued against undue practices and unfair returns in the coming elections.

In the hotly contested election which followed the Leislerians again triumphed, and on August 19 Nanfan met the new house.² Shortly before the return of the lieutenant governor from Barbadoes, William Atwood and Sampson Shelton Broughton had arrived from England. They both came with commissions from the king, the former to be chief justice and the latter attorney general.³ They were trained lawyers and had been sent in response to the urgent request of Bellomont. Atwood was promoted to Smith's place on the bench of the supreme court and De Peyster and Walters were made his assistants. Under direction from the board of trade an order was issued by the governor and council for opening a court of chancery, though it is doubtful if the court ever sat.⁴ Atwood was made a member of the council, and placed his legal knowledge and experience wholly at the service of the dominant faction, of which Weaver was the leading spirit. But Broughton held back and soon identified himself with the opposing group.⁵

At the opening of the assembly Nanfan, who had just come down the river, was able to inform them not only that the king had granted £2500 for the improvement of the defences

¹ Ibid., 272, 287, 436.

² Ass. J. I., 115.

³ Out of the royal revenue they were to receive salaries of £300 and £150 respectively. Attorney General Northey stated later that he had known Broughton for many years and that he was a barrister of long standing in the Middle Temple. Broughton died in office in New York. N. Y. Docs. V, 49, 51.

⁴ Smith, History of New York, I, 137.

⁵ Colls. of N. Y. Hist. Soc. Fund Series, 1880. (The case of William Atwood, Esq.) This was sent as a pamphlet from England to New York in 1703. Ass. J. I., 163; C. J. I., 193; N. Y. Col. Docs., IV, 882, 914, 929.

of Albany and Schenectady and the building of the fort at Onondaga, but of the remarkable treaty which the Five Nations had just concluded with him in which they had apparently made submission to the English and ceded so much territory to them. This, with the peace which shortly before they had concluded with the French, was to insure tranquillity to New York during most of the next war. No more important events than these had ever been laid before a New York assembly, but they passed without notice and the province was again plunged into the agonies of partisan conflict.

Nicoll and Gouverneur were candidates for the speakership and the latter of course won. An attack was then made on Nicoll and Dirck Wessells in the form of a motion that they were not qualified to sit under the election law which had been passed in 1699,¹ because they were not residents of the counties from which they were returned. Nicoll sought to parry this blow by reviving the old charge that the speaker was by birth an alien and therefore not qualified to occupy the chair and until further satisfaction was given on that point they could not act with him. The house had resolved that it would proceed to no other business until the right of Nicoll and Wessells to their seats was settled, and Gouverneur refused to answer the charge against him until this resolution had been obeyed.² Thereupon Nicoll, Wessells and eight other members withdrew. Among these were four who had signed the protest against the former assembly for which Howell had been expelled. The charge against Nicoll and Wessells was then proven to be true, and also the complaint that the latter had bribed the sheriff who returned him. Their seats were declared vacant and the members who sided with them, continuing to absent themselves, they were expelled and the issue of new writs to fill their seats was ordered. During the interval the house continued with only eleven members, but the new elections raised its number to sixteen.

The next move of the faction was to attack Robert Livingston who, in addition to having been an opponent of Leisler, ¹ Col. Laws I, 405; Journal of Leg. Coun. I, 169; N. Y. Col. Docs. IV, 950. Nicoll had been returned for Suffolk but was a resident of Queens. Wessells had been returned for Albany, but was a resident of Dutchess.

² Ass. J. I, 115 et seq.

had recently given offence by his support of Smith. From the consideration of the accounts of Van Cortlandt, concerning which there had been some trouble since the last days of Bellomont, the commissioners passed to Livingston, whose accounts were large and of long standing.¹ They said he had declined to report except for the excise of Albany and that he kept no books of his dealings with the government, though he had received over £20,000. A joint committee then reported that, unless he would forthwith account, an act ought to pass confiscating his estate. An order in accordance with this was issued by the house; Livingston appeared and complained of the hardship to which they were subjecting him, but they would allow him no more time. Early in September a bill was introduced into the house to confiscate enough of Livingston's property to meet his indebtedness to the province, which, on account of the excise at Albany alone, was estimated to amount to over £17,000. Other bills extending back to Dongan's time and amounting to £690 had not been settled. His estate was to be sequestered until he should account. The friends of Livingston now attempted to save him by procuring from the Indians an expression of desire that he might be sent to England as their agent. To this the house would not assent and, on the theory that the Indians had probably been imposed upon, it asked Nanfan to suspend him from his secretaryship of Indian affairs and procure his removal by the king.

While the bill against Livingston was under consideration, three of the members from Queens county presented a paper in which the legality of the assembly was questioned because its speaker had not yet cleared himself from the charge of being an alien.² The expulsion of Nicoll and his friends and the seating of two others who were said not to have been elected by the people were unfavorably commented on and the charge was made that a bill was in preparation for disfranchising many of the English in the province. The paper closed with the declaration that until the speaker cleared himself from the charge they could not sit with the assembly.

¹ Ibid., 119 et seq.; C. J. I, 120 et seq.

² Ass. J. I, 128; C. J. I, 168. They were Thomas Willett, John Talmon and William Willett.

The signers were at once called to account and were summoned from their homes for the purpose. They refused to attend, whereupon they were expelled and an order was issued for their prosecution, though it appears never to have been executed.

While these attacks on the anti-Leislerians were in progress a petition from Jacob Leisler to the crown for the restoration to his family of £2700, which was alleged to be part of the sum that the elder Leisler had expended for the defence of the province, was laid before the assembly.¹ It was considered in committee of the whole and a resolution was reached that the entire sum should be paid, but measures to that end were not perfected this session. It can well be imagined that when the assembly adjourned the feeling between the two factions had become very bitter. It was reflected in the regular fall election of the City of New York, where a scrutiny had to be taken in three of the wards and a long dispute occurred between the two factions over the swearing in of aldermen and assistants.² This was brought out before the supreme court.

The appointment of a governor was expected and it was already reported that Lord Cornbury would be the man. In December, 1701, in order to secure aid and protection against the assembly and its arbitrary acts, three numerous signed addresses were prepared by anti-Leislerians, one to the king, another to parliament, a third of congratulation to Lord Cornbury.³ Nicholas Bayard and his son were leaders in the drafting of these and in procuring the signatures. The signers came from all classes of the people and from all nationalities and the petitions were circulated in most of the counties. Naturally, however, the majority of the signatures came from New York City and its neighborhood and it was charged, with probable truth, that many soldiers and others signed under influence and without knowing the contents of the papers. Many signatures were affixed in the tavern kept by Alderman John Hutchins, in New York City, and he was charged by the Leislerians with resorting to various illegal measures in procuring these. In the petitions the whole course of the Leislerian faction was arraigned in the strongest terms. They were charged with designs and practices, with disregard for the interests of the crown, with oppression of their opponents and the promotion of the scum of the people to office. The policy of Bellomont came in for sweeping condemnation and the present assembly was charged with using unwarrantable means to secure the support of Nanfan and Atwood for their illegal measures. The appeal to Cornbury over the head of Nanfan might conveniently be interpreted as a treasonable disregard of the existing government.

¹ Ass. J. I, 133 et seq.

² Min. of Com. Coun. II, 151, 159 et seq., 179, 181; Atwood's defence, as above, 258 et seq.

³ N. Y. Col. Docs. IV, 933 et seq.; Min. of Common Council, 1674-1776, II, 150-198. Thomas Noell was the new mayor who held to his position and claims as obstinately against the assaults of Isaac de Riemer, the Leislerian, and his supporters. Smith, I, 142; Ex. C. Min., p. 264, et seq.

It was quite impossible to keep the substance of these petitions from becoming known to the Leislerians, and the council demanded that copies of them should be submitted to it. This demand was refused, and Attorney General Broughton gave it as his opinion that there was nothing criminal or illegal in the petitions themselves, or in the steps taken to procure signatures. But in the midst of the unscrupulous party warfare which was then being carried on, the chance to crush their opponents by prosecutions for treason, as the leaders of the Leislerian party had been crushed in 1691, was too good to be lost. Some boasts uttered, it is said by the rector of Trinity Church, among others, increased the temptation. The act which the anti-Leislerians had passed in 1691¹ for quieting disorders in the province could be used for the purpose. Bayard had been a leader in the passage of that measure and now he was to be its conspicuous victim. Three justices were on the bench who could be trusted to serve the interests of the faction to the full extent that was possible. Broughton, for giving the above opinion, was pushed one side, and a new office of solicitor general was created to which Weaver was appointed. The other departments of the government were also controlled by Leislerians.

Hutchins was first committed to prison without bail by the council on the charge of treason, because he would not produce copies of the petitions.² As a matter of fact, they were not then in his possession and he could not produce them. Bayard and his son were bound over under heavy bonds to appear at the April term of the supreme court. Later, on the strength of a statement in a petition of French, Wenham and Rip Van Dam—associates of Bayard—that the petitions were in their custody, Bayard was committed for high treason, and the three petitioners were given six days in which to produce the papers. Later they were threatened with prosecution, but news that Lord Cornbury, the new governor, was about to sail from England put a stop to this, and Bayard and Hutchins were the only ones to feel the full weight of Leislerian vengeance.¹

¹ Col. Laws, I, 223.

² N. Y. Col. Docs. IV, 947, 950.

The political conflict was now transferred to the court room, Weaver and Nicoll, two of the leading contestants, appearing as counsel. Nicoll had the assistance of James Emott, whose knowledge of the law apparently far exceeded his own,² but Weaver had much more effective support from the bench, where Atwood steadily decided every point in favor of the prosecution and his associates feebly echoed his opinions. Though the forms of courteous speech were usually observed the partisanship of Chief Justice Jeffreys was never more pronounced than was that of Atwood in these trials. The somewhat technical objection by the defence, that the indictment was found by eleven and not twelve jurors, was overruled by the court. So also was the argument of fundamental importance, that the New York act under which the charge was brought defined as treason something which was not such by English law. But the justice made a telling point when he argued that the act in question had been confirmed by the king and therefore must stand as law in New ¹ The record of the trial, though imperfect and prepared by Bayard or his supporters, is in Howell's State Trials, XIV. It is known that Bayard took some notes during the trial and they were probably expanded into this version, which was published. An account of the trial written from the opposite standpoint was published in New York soon after the arrival of Cornbury. Atwood says Bayard and Jameson put it out. See an answer to some of its statements in Atwood's Defence, as above, p. 298 et seq. Atwood's account is in his defence, already referred to. Cornbury's characterization of it is in N. Y. Docs. IV, 974. An account by Bayard is in ibid., 952 et seq. See also Smith, I, 143.

² Emott had been connected with the arrest of Kidd. See documents relating to that affair printed in Journal of H. of Commons XIII. References to him in connection with Fletcher's time are in the Colonial Calendar.

York. It was contended by Bayard's counsel that the drawing and signing of the addresses were only the exercise of the right of petition guaranteed in the bill of rights, and that the accused had not been guilty of unreasonable or offensive activity in connection with these. But in his charge to the jury Atwood insisted that the addresses were libels on the government, a disowning of its authority, and were intended to cause its overthrow. The inducing of soldiers in particular to sign them was sedition and an encouragement to mutiny, and in connection with it all Bayard had been previously active. But to a modern mind a fatal defect in the case for the prosecution appears in the fact that the addresses in question were never produced in court or seen by either petty or grand jury.¹ When a jury which the defence alleged had been packed with their opponents, with men whose acquaintance with English was very slight and some of them not even naturalized, had returned a verdict of guilty, all arguments which could be urged in support of a claim for arrest of judgment were set aside and sentence of death, also involving attainder, was pronounced. The trial of Hutchins followed with a similar foregone conclusion. In the trial of one Baker for making alleged scandalous statements about the king, the jury was said to have been forced by threats from the bench to bring in a verdict of guilty.

The anti-Leislerians now seemed humbled and were facing a tragedy comparable with that which ended in the execution of Leisler and Milbourne. The accused appealed to the lieutenant governor for a reprieve until the pleasure of the king could be known. But this was refused,² in the case of Bayard, unless he would acknowledge himself guilty of the crime. This for a time he declined to do, but finally signed a statement that he was sorrowful for the offence which by the sentence he found he had committed and begged pardon for it. The reprieve was then granted, though it was interpreted by the Leislerians as an acknowledgment by Bayard that he was guilty of high treason. Hutchins, under the influence of fear, is said to have secured his reprieve by a much more direct confession.³

¹ N. Y. Docs. IV, 974.

² Case of Atwood, as above, p. 280.

³ N. Y. Docs. IV, 953.

The Leislerian legislature, which met again in April, 1702, about a month after the close of the trials, passed some measures which were of importance in confirming the position of the party. It outlawed Wenham and French, two prominent opponents, and provided for the payment of a part of the sum of £2700 demanded by the younger Leisler as compensation for what his father was alleged to have spent for the defence of the province. Special commissioners were designated in this act and very stringent provisions were included for its execution. In the law for the continuance of the revenue for two years longer provision was made that the salary of Justice Atwood should be continued and for a special payment in case he should be removed before the end of two years, and both in "consideration of his great services for the good of the province." Another act, also of a decidedly political character, was the one augmenting the number of representatives in the assembly by five from New York City and county and from the region about Albany, those sections where the Leislerian feeling was supposed to be strongest.¹ By still another act, regulating the election of magistrates in the City of New York, the purpose of which was to undo, so far as possible, the counting in of anti-Leislerian officials the previous autumn and to render such proceeding by that party impossible in the future.

While the above acts were being passed Lord Cornbury had arrived in the lower bay, and was attended there by Wenham,² French, Vesey and Jameson, who shortly before had retired for safety into New Jersey. Daniel Honan, of unsavory reputation as private secretary of Fletcher, returned with ¹ Col. Laws, I, 476, 478, 479, 487, 490; Ass. J. I, 141, N. Y. Docs. IV, 958.

² N. Y. Col. Docs. IV, 955, 1034, 1090. For Cornbury's views of the condition of the province as he found it, see Ibid., 971 et seq. For a view unfavorable to Cornbury and containing many vivid touches and useful details, see Atwood's "Case" etc., as above, p. 285 et seq. The board of trade remonstrated with Cornbury for taking Honan as secretary and he told the board that he had dismissed him. N. Y. Col. Docs. IV, 925, 927. For other references to Cornbury's arrival and efforts to arrest Weaver, see the Winthrop Papers, 6, Mass. Hist. Colls. III, 91 et seq. The opinion which the board of trade had of Honan appears in its letter to Cornbury under date of Jan. 26, 1702/3. Cal. St. P. Col. Honan acted for a brief time as secretary of the province, but he was superseded on the arrival in August, 1703, of George Clarke from England, with a commission as secretary as well as deputy auditor. Ex. C. Min. Aug. 5, 1703.

Cornbury. John Bridges and Peter Fauconier accompanied the new governor. Bridges, an insignificant man, was soon to succeed to the office of chief justice. Fauconier, whom Cornbury called an "expert accountant" and who in England had been a contractor for army clothing, and is said to have been a bankrupt, was appointed naval officer and also one of the commissioners for executing the office of collector, a board which Cornbury established after the suspension of Weaver. He was to be closely concerned with the shady transactions of the administration which was now beginning.

If ever an appointment was due to favoritism in England, it was that of Lord Cornbury. While not without ability, he was the needy scion of a noble house, whose spendthrift habits had left his fortune sadly in need of improvement. He was the nephew of the queen, the heir of the great title of Clarendon and, in due time was to receive it, but not until he had been in a debtor's prison in New York and had done probably more than any other royal governor to bring British administration in America into disrepute. Years before he had recommended himself to William by early espousing his cause, and for this, in the summer of 1701, he had received his appointment to New York with command over the militia of New Jersey and Connecticut.¹ Being a man of military experience, during the long interval between his appointment and his departure for America Cornbury devoted some attention to securing money and supplies for the royal troops in New York. He repeatedly appeared with their agent, Mr. Champante, on errands of this sort before the board of trade, and we know that he had dealings with the other boards as well. He had also been a member of the house of commons. He and Joseph Dudley set sail for their governments about the same time, and we can be sure that by that time Lord Cornbury was reasonably well informed as to the condition of his province.

Cornbury in his instructions was warned to avoid partisan alliances and to use his influence for calming the passions which had been aroused. But what he really did was to assume the leadership of the anti-Leislerians and drive their opponents from power and office. Weaver, Atwood and their associates had gone to such extremes in partisanship that some reprisals could hardly be avoided. But a mere repetition of the unfortunate tactics of Bellomont did not imply statesmanship, especially if it was not accompanied with efforts toward reform. From Honan and others Cornbury must have learned of the methods of plunder which had been used under Fletcher and of their success. It is possible that he had sought an appointment in New York because he realized that they could best be applied in that province. In Massachusetts they certainly could not have been used to any great extent. Virginia, too, would not have offered a favorable field. The other provinces were too small or were out of his reach. In faction-ridden New York, with its group of merchants and officials who were not above dealings with pirates, and its speculators in wild lands, profitable investments could always be found. With the aid of the same unscrupulous faction which had supported Fletcher, the policy of that worthy could be imitated and extended to robberies of indefinite amount from the public revenue itself. This constituted the chief feature of the Cornbury régime in New York. But before its results are described, an account must be given of the downfall of the Leislerians.

¹ See references in Cal. St. P. Col., 1701, and corresponding entries in N. Y. Col. Docs. IV, 912 et seq.

On June 9, 1702, before the executive council, charges were preferred against the five Leislerian councillors.¹ Those against Atwood were based on the extreme partiality with which he had conducted the case against Bayard and Hutchins; those against Weaver proceeded from the alleged irregularity in his accounts. These charges were drawn by Wenham, Nicoll, Jameson and other anti-Leislerian leaders. Cornbury in his letters declared that the accused had planned the removal of the English from all positions of influence in New York and their replacement by the Dutch, whom he called the "black party." This is a much too simple explanation of the Leislerian movement and is not in accordance with the facts. Much nearer the truth was the statement, made by Bayard and others, that its object was to drive the leading families, both Dutch and English, from power and install the opposing faction, which perhaps stood a little nearer the common people, in their places. Personal jealousy, mere lust for the spoils of office and purely factional zeal were too much combined in the spirit of the Leislerians to admit of their movement being defined as clearly democratic. There was not enough common consciousness then existing among the people of New York to make a democratic movement possible.

¹ For Cornbury's opinions on these, see N. Y. Docs. IV, 971, 974, 1010, 1012. Atwood's side of the case is in ibid., 1022, and in his "Case," 285 et seq., 294; Ex. C. Min. June 9, 1702, and later dates.

The presentation of the charges was soon followed by the suspension of the accused from office and the flight of Weaver and Atwood to New Jersey and thence to Virginia, from which colony they sailed for England. There they were removed from office by order of council¹ and the sentences against Bayard and Hutchins were reversed. The assembly which Cornbury found in existence was dissolved and the acts that had been rushed through during its last session were disallowed.² Colonel Smith was restored for a brief time to the chief justiceship, to be soon replaced by Bridges. Prolonged inquiries were made into the accounts of the province while Weaver was collector and receiver general, and they were declared to be in great confusion. He was charged with partiality in his payments to creditors of the province. He had apparently not kept regular accounts of receipts and payments. It was said that for more than a year he had not sent his accounts to England. If half of the charges made against Weaver were true, they show that, like so many of his contemporaries in England and so many who have succeeded him in this country, he was too much absorbed in politics to make an honest official.³ Atwood, too, was a good example of the political judge.

Apart from the downfall of Atwood and Weaver, the reprisals which accompanied the reaction under Cornbury were not many. Bayard and Hutchins began ineffective suits against the associate justices and members of the grand jury who had been concerned in their prosecution, but later they were dropped.¹ In June, 1703, the New York legislature passed an act declaring illegal the proceedings against Bayard and Hutchins and reversing all judgments against them. This was duly approved by the crown.² Nanfan, however, who had been an instrument of the chief intriguers rather than a leader, was pursued by Cornbury and his satellites until he was nearly or quite ruined.³ In the first charge, which had to do with payment for supplies for the four independent companies in excess of what had been sent for the purpose from England, Champante, the agent, was to an extent involved. The second charge was brought by two private parties and was for false imprisonment, which was prolonged for many months, the case as a whole taking the form of malicious persecution. Nanfan repeatedly applied to the board of trade for relief and it warned Cornbury that, if the allegations were true, the ex-lieutenant governor was suffering great hardships. It is evident that Fauconier had a hand in this business. In August, 1704, Champante wrote to the board of trade⁴ that Nanfan had been seventeen months in jail for his alleged failure to pay in England certain bills which had been drawn for the subsistence of the troops. But it had been fully shown to the board and admitted by Cornbury's agents that Nanfan had subsisted the troops for four and one-half months longer than the time for which their subsistence had been issued. The board of trade had repeatedly directed Cornbury to state Nanfan's accounts at once, but the governor had delayed or opposed this on the pretence

¹ Jan. 21, 1702/3. Acts of Privy C. Col. II, 242 et seq., 820-1.

² N. Y. Docs. IV, 961, 999, 1023-4, 1066; Cal. St. P. Col., 1702-3, p. 97, Acts of P. C. Col. II, 414, 849.

³ On the other hand, there is preserved in one of the Libers of the Surrogate's Office of New York County a detailed and beautifully written statement of the trade of this port, inwards and outwards, for about two years while Weaver was collector. This is a good business document and is valuable, as it is about the only original statement of that kind which has survived.

¹ N. Y. Docs. IV, 1032. Atwood, "Case," 296.

² Col. Laws, I, 531. N. Y. Col. Docs. IV, 1123. Acts of P. C. Col., II, 850.

³ N. Y. Col. Docs. IV, 929, 1018, 1027, 1033, 1073, 1080, 1100, 1114.

⁴ C. O. 5/1048, 90, Aug. 28, 1704. There is a mass of papers in this volume which purport to be Nanfan's accounts and they may be the "intricately contrived" statement which Fauconier sent over. The case of Nanfan can be followed through the letters which he sent to the board of trade and the statements of Champante. Cal. St. Papers, Col., 1702-1703, pp. 50, 75, 95, 178, 196, 197, 201, 226, 254, 262, 270, 281, 314-315, 455, 581, 595, 609, 674, 720. The complaint of false imprisonment brought against him by Graves and Prideaux raised an interesting side issue suggesting the possibility, had the charge been valid, of Nanfan's being prosecuted in England under the act for the punishment of governors.

that a large balance would appear as due from Nanfan. At last, writes Champante, Fauconier had "framed an imaginary account, which he has so intricately contrived that it is beyond the understanding of Nanfan or of his friends, and Cornbury has sent this over as a stated account against Nanfan. Besides several other errors in it, he is charged with sums he never received and with off-reckonings he never had anything to do with. This is all Cornbury has done in the matter in about 2½ years." Sometime before this Lord Treasurer Godolphin had ordered £1500 set aside for the payment of the merchants to whom Cornbury claimed that Nanfan was indebted, when the latter's accounts were settled. As there was no prospect of their being settled in New York, Champante now urged that the merchants be paid the above sum and Nanfan released before his ruin was complete. It may well be that this was the way in which the affair was settled.

Lady Bellomont also, who was Nanfan's sister, found it impossible to get the accounts of her late husband settled in New York, and the matter dragged on many months to her great loss, until she returned to England in the hope of obtaining some relief there. Questions growing out of subsistence for the troops were also involved in this case. In 1704 Cornbury wrote to Godolphin at great length on these accounts, stating that referees had been appointed by himself and Lady Bellomont, Fauconier appearing among those selected by the governor. They claimed that no payments by the late governor should be allowed for which vouchers could not be produced and made out that his estate owed the crown more than £24,000.¹ This, of course, her ladyship's referees, who were two New York merchants, would not accept, and so it devolved on the treasury in England to straighten out this tangle which had been caused by careless bookkeeping and partisan colonial politics.

The election of 1702 resulted in a triumph for the anti-Leislerians. Gouverneur was dropped and Nicoll, with others, who had been so roughly treated by the last assembly, were returned. The majority, after sundry reflections on the loose and partisan government which had preceded, addressed itself more and more to the financial questions which were the outgrowth of the war and of the dishonest manipulation of expenditures by the provincial executive. Though New York for several years was not directly involved in the second colonial war, yet questions of defence and supply, due to alarms and the necessity of maintaining and strengthening garrisons on the frontier, were prominent subjects of discussion. At the request of Cornbury a new militia act was passed and also a law to prevent the eluding of detachments or drafts by making it lawful for the officers of any company to seize such offenders and have them tried by justices of the peace instead of waiting for trial before the courts of common pleas, which occasioned great delays. By another act¹ it was provided that more stringent measures be taken to collect the arrears of the tax which had been imposed in Bellomont's time toward building the fort at Onondaga. Three special appropriation acts were passed,² carrying specific sums — £1800, £1500 and £1300 — to be used respectively for paying 150 fusileers and scouts on the frontier, for the construction of two batteries at the Narrows and for the employment of 100 additional men for the defence of the frontier. The collectors and receiver general were required to keep a particular account of receipts and payments. By two other acts also provision had been made for a committee, whose members were named in the laws, to examine and state accounts.³ In order to raise the money for the fortification of the Narrows a graduated poll tax was resorted to, bearing rather heavily on councillors, attorneys, well-to-do bachelors and wearers of wigs. After consideration in committee of a report of the commissioners of accounts on the state of the finances, an address was presented to the governor.⁴ In this not only was the old complaint about the reduction of the strength of the province by the lopping off of New Jersey and western Connecticut repeated, but the Bellomont régime, was condemned by the statement that a large part of the £2200 which had been granted since the peace of Ryswick

¹ Cal. of Treasury Papers.

¹ Col. Laws of N. Y. I, 500, 546, 557, 571.

² Ibid., 493, 550, 562; Ass. J. I, 164, 165; N. Y. Docs. IV, 1064.

³ Ibid., 518, 548.

⁴ Ass. J: I, 166.

had been profusely used and misapplied, contrary both to the objects for which it was given and to the commission and instructions of the late governor. The fact that duties and fees were fixed without limit by the executive and the union in the same hands — meaning those of Atwood — of the offices of chief justice and judge of admiralty, in the opinion of the legislature were destroying the trade of New York. "It cannot but be obvious," they continued, "what encouragement it is for a man that has something he may call his own to expose it by coming to trade where he has no other assurance of his property but the self denial of a judge awarding against his own profit and interest." The address probably voiced the protest of the merchants against the favor shown by Bellomont and the Leislerians toward import duties as a means of raising revenues as truly as it did a disbelief in the honesty of the New York judiciary.

But a question of more immediate importance was raised by the commissioners of accounts. The assembly addressed the council,¹ enlarging on the misapplication of the revenue and other moneys heretofore granted by the people, as shown by the report of the commissioners, and asked that some proper person be appointed treasurer to receive and pay out the revenue about to be appropriated "as a means to obstruct the like misapplication for the future." They informed the governor how unnecessary and burdensome were the fees, particularly those at the custom house, and how greatly they obstructed trade. They had hoped for relief by law, but had been informed that the governor was prevented from granting it by his instructions. Therefore they asked that he would lay these complaints before the queen, that a treasurer might be appointed who would give good security for the due execution of his office and that instructions might be issued which would relieve them from undue fees and exactions. In his letter home Cornbury briefly commented on the laws which had been passed during the session,² but made no reference to the subject of the address. The reader can understand why this was so when he learns that, on his first journey to Albany for a conference with the Indians, the governor had spent nearly £2200, a sum far beyond what other conferences had cost. Also no stint was put upon the expenditures for firewood and candles for the fort at New York.¹

¹ Ass. J. I, 170. It should be borne in mind, as we enter on this period of financial controversy, that by royal instructions to all the governors all moneys had to be granted to the monarch, they had to be accounted for at the office of the auditor general of the plantations, and no money should be issued except by warrant under the governor's hand and with the consent of the council.

² N. Y. Col. Docs. IV, 1064.

In the brief fall session of 1703² a general order was received from the queen, which had its origin more from conditions in Massachusetts than from those which existed in New York, forbidding governors henceforth to receive gifts from their assemblies, meaning by that annual salaries or grants for short terms. The salary of the governor of New York was increased from £600 to £1200, which, in accordance with his instructions, was to be a stated burden upon the royal revenue of the province. It restricted by so much the control over expenditures which the assembly had now begun to desire should be made complete.

In his opening speech before the spring session of 1704 the governor stated that the revenue of New York was small and suggested the revival of an act of 1699 for raising an additional duty.³ Such measures had occasionally been resorted to in the past as a means of checking the too rapid growth of the provincial debt. In its reply the assembly asked to be informed if the reduction of the revenue — which ordinarily was about £4000 per annum — was to be attributed to a decline in the amount collected or to an increase of expenditures, so that proper remedies might be applied.⁴ Under a promise from the governor, Kiliaen Van Rensselaer was at once ordered by the council to carry to the lower house a list of the salaries of the officers of the province, with a statement of the revenue as it was at the close of the previous July.⁵ Later the salary list for 1694 was also submitted.⁶ The house went into committee of the whole on the revenue. The collectors of Kings county were ordered to attend and

¹ N. Y. Col. Docs. V, 111, 407.

² Ass. J. I, 173 et seq.; C. J. I, 205 et seq.; N. Y. Docs. IV, 1040.

³ Ass. J. I, 175 et seq.; C. J. I, 209; Col. Laws I, 403; Spencer, Phases of New York Government, 111.

⁴ Ass. J. I, 176.

⁵ C. J. I, 209.

⁶ Ass. J. I, 177.

answer a complaint of certain inhabitants arising in connection with the payment of arrears due under the act for the levy of £1000 toward the building of the fort at Onondaga. They appeared and were examined. Mr. Fauconier presented an account of the £1800 which had been appropriated in 1702,¹ for the support of fusileers. During several sessions the house sat in committee of the whole, considering salaries, revenue and the condition of the frontiers. This discussion was carried on in close connection with that on the repeal of the last section of the act of 1691 for quieting disorders, on which had been based the reprisals of previous years.²

The committee of accounts reported to the house that, owing to defective collection but chiefly to expenditures which were in violation of the directions expressed in the acts for the levy of £1800 and £1300, the sum of £913 15s. was due to the colony. In the bill which was then introduced for a further appropriation toward the defence of the frontiers provision was made that the amount actually to be raised should be diminished by £913 15s., the "balance due the colony." The council proposed an amendment to this, but the house refused to admit its right to amend a money bill. The council stood firm and the bill, as thus drawn, failed to become law.

On examining Fauconier's accounts the house found in them evidence of overcharges and misapplications of revenue, by Colonel Abraham Schuyler and others, amounting to more than £485.³ This led them, in formulating the bill for the ensuing grant, to specify not only the number of men who were to be raised, but the number of their officers and where they should be posted.¹ Men from Albany also were to be employed, if at all, only as scouts. This Cornbury denounced as an encroachment on his powers. He declared that the house had no right to meddle with the expenditure of money, that it was not implied in the power which the queen 'by instruction had granted the assembly to examine accounts. To this the assembly replied in moderate terms, but yet with a firm insistence on its responsibility for the liberty and property of the people, so often confirmed by English laws, to which they conceived every free Englishman to be entitled. "Whatsoever else may admit of controversy, the people of this colony think they have an undoubted . . . property in their goods and estates, of which they ought not to be divested but by their free consent, in such manner, to such ends and purposes, as they shall think fit, and not otherwise. If the contrary should be admitted, all notion of property would cease; every man is the most proper judge of his own capacity in giving, and the present extreme poverty of this country is both visible and too apparent." Behind these words, following the lines of English precedent, lay the demand of the assembly for responsible government, and in its absence the colonial assemblies generally found their excuse for assuming functions which in any well ordered government belong properly to the executive. This was now to be done in New York.

¹ Col. Laws, I, 493.

² Ass J. I, 176-179, 180-189. C. J. I, 208, 210, 212-218. A controversy also arose between the two houses over the wording of the enacting clause of this bill. The council thought that the words "advice and consent" should be used, but the house insisted that "advice" should be omitted, as not a proper description of the function performed in legislation. The house also insisted that it should be called the "general assembly." The council argued that this expression included governor, council and assembly, that the house was claiming too much and was violating common usage. Conferences were held over the question, and the governor charged the house with innovation, with encroachment on the prerogative, and with claiming the sole power to interpret the meaning of the crown. The house denied these charges. But it was wrong in the claim it made concerning its title, and that designation was not used in the statutes of the period.

³ Ass. J. I. 183, 188; C. J. I, 218.

When the council tried to amend the new revenue bill, the assembly again sent up a resolve that it was inconvenient to admit of any amendment by the council to a money bill.² At the request of the council a general conference was held, but the house adhered to its position. At the same time, conferences were held over amendments to a bill from the council for the more effectual collection of quit rents. The result was that both bills failed and the session closed without provision for revenue or defence. But the New York assembly had shown that, during the decade of its existence, it had gained some experience and was now able to enter upon a contest with the executive for supremacy in the province.

The legislature met again in October. The governor stated that in July last he had called out 100 men and sent them to the frontier and he thought provision should be made for keeping them there till the close of the following March. He therefore recommended a revival of the additional duty — a bill of the same nature as the one which he had proposed in the previous session. A bill was sent up by the lower house. The council proposed amendments. To these the house objected. The deadlock was renewed, and after a session of about three weeks, of the debates during which the journals give very slight hints, the assembly was dissolved.¹

¹ Ass. J. I., 186-188; C. J. I., 215 et seq.; Smith I., 154-156.

² Ass. J. I., 190, et seq.; C. J. I., 218, et seq.

Not until June, 1705, did the newly elected assembly meet. Although during these years New York was not involved in the war, yet she was frequently disturbed by alarms. These arose from rumors of French invasion both by land and sea, and necessitated continuous attention to the frontier and to the defence of New York City. A detachment had been sent to Albany in the fall of 1704. For these reasons Cornbury asked the new assembly — nearly all of whose members had been reelected — not only to provide for 100 fusileers and 50 scouts, but for the payment of the debt of the province as well. While the house was discussing provision for the troops asked for, the next forward step was taken, which proceeded naturally from what had already occurred. A motion was made and unanimously carried that the house should appoint a treasurer for receiving and paying out the public moneys to be raised. A bill for raising £1700 for the defence of the frontiers, and carrying with it the designation of Richard Willet as treasurer was then passed by the house. Together with several other bills, it was sent to the council.² There it was amended, but the amendments were rejected by the house. The governor then called the assembly before him and told them that he had received a letter from the board of trade, in which it said it saw no reason why the council should not amend money bills. He hoped this would end the controversy. But the house, led as Cornbury thought by French and Coddington of New York county and Garton of Ulster, remained obdurate, and the money bill failed.

In the adjourned September session the struggle was renewed, the bill which was sent up by the house being amended

¹ Ass. J. I, 192, et seq.; C. J. I, 221, et seq.

² N. Y. Docs. IV, 1154; Ass. J. I, 197, 199; C. J. I, 226, 227, 229.

in council so as to bring it into conformity with the royal instructions.¹ The assembly defended the provisions on which it had insisted, claiming that the right given to it to examine accounts was intended as a restriction on the governor, and that it was the real intent of the crown that the house should be thoroughly informed and satisfied that the money granted was applied to the uses for which it was appointed. But, it continued, hitherto it had been quite impossible for the assembly to examine the accounts of the receivers, because they had usually left the province under suspension, because of quarrels with the governors, and their accounts had been found in confusion. The assembly, therefore, had been left in the dark as to the disposition of moneys and the increase and decrease of the several branches of the revenue. Several hundred pounds, voted for the defence of Albany, had not been applied to that use. Sums reported to have been paid were yet unpaid, and parties had received payments for services never rendered. After a further conference and still another attempt of the council to amend the bill,² the assembly was prorogued and did not meet again until May, 1706. At the beginning of that session Lord Cornbury presented to them the need of fortifying New York City, of reviving the militia act which had expired in 1704 and of providing revenue for the frontier. In committee of the whole during some twelve sessions the house considered ways and means for fortifying New York City. It conferred with managers of fortifications and got an estimate that the work would cost £4000. It inquired as to the population of the city. It examined reports from Wenham, Fauconier and Byerly as to the expenditure of earlier grants. It finally resolved to raise £3000, one-half of which should be paid by the city and county of New York. At the same time bills for the militia and the frontier were considered and passed. Near the close of these debates nine inhabitants of Albany were taken into custody on the charge of circulating a paper in which false reproaches were made against the justice and integrity of the house.³ The committee of the council to which were referred the two revenue bills, and of which Justice Mompesson was chairman,¹ favored passing them without amendment; but the bills were held up by the governor until the next session, when he expected further instructions from home.

¹ N. Y. Docs. IV, 1165, 1169; Ass. J. I, 205, 206.

² Ass. J. I., 207, 208; C. J. I, 236.

³ Ass. J. I, 211.

At the opening of the next session, which began near the close of September, 1706, Cornbury was able to inform the house that he had received authority to permit the assembly to designate a treasurer when it appropriated supplies which were not a part of the standing revenue, but a treasurer so nominated must be accountable to the governor, council and assembly.² Warrants might be issued by military officers or others, as the acts should direct, but the governor must always be informed of the need for such, and the persons acting must be accountable to the entire legislature. Though this important concession was made on the chief point contended for by the assembly, in reference to the right of the council to amend money bills the crown adhered to its opinion that they had that right. Before the session closed two important acts were passed which illustrated the principle of the reform just achieved. One carried an appropriation for fortifying New York City and also designated Abraham De Peyster as treasurer and a board of commissioners to see that the sum was properly expended.³ The other provided under similar conditions for the expenditure of a sum for the defence of the northern frontier. These sums were to be used for the purposes expressed in the acts and no others, and the appropriation for the frontier was made detailed and specific. De Peyster, the treasurer, was required to give security to Nicoll, the speaker of the house, for the proper expenditure of the money and must cooperate with the commissioners named in the act. This shows that the house was to an extent aware of the frauds of which Cornbury and his clique were guilty, though the evidence which we now possess of them did not appear until after Robert Hunter became governor.

Under Cornbury the efficacy of the British system of control over expenditures in the provinces was put to its severest test. The royal instructions provided that claims should be paid exclusively by warrants issued by the governors on advice of their councils. The administrative check upon dishonesty and extravagance under this system must come from the deputy auditor or possibly from the collector and receiver general. These were appointees of the treasury in England, the former being the representative of the auditor general. Over the appointment of the latter the governor might and usually did have an influence, and in the province he was also ex officio a member of the council. In cases where the council was subservient to the governor, he would be under strong temptation to yield to the general current. The men who came to New York during the first year of Cornbury's administration as the incumbents of these offices were George Clarke and Thomas Byerly. Clarke¹ was a nephew of William Blathwayt, his superior in office, and was now to begin a long official career in New York. At this time he held the two offices of secretary and deputy auditor. Of Byerly before his arrival in New York we know nothing. In so far as they might come to an issue with the governor and his confidants, they must present their complaints before the treasury in England, a distant centre, and await its action.² The letters of Blathwayt to Clarke, as well as his correspondence with officials in other provinces show that the duties of the auditor general were at this time being faithfully performed.³ He received detailed reports regularly from both Clarke and Byerly, but observed that Byerly should have made oath as to the truth of his accounts before the governor and council or the chief justice. The governor, it was expected, would already have made a return of Weaver's accounts in due form and was warned to do so without delay. Clarke was also directed to ask for the accounts for the four months between Weaver's departure and the arrival of Byerly. Ample security was also required from all receivers general, but the remoteness of the colonies from Westminster and official negligence and routine made the enforcement of a system of audit slow and ineffective at best.

¹ C. J. I, 239 et seq.

² N. Y. Docs. IV, 1172; Ass. J. I, 213; C. J. I, 241 et seq.

³ Col. Laws, I, 593, 598.

¹ Clarke's jurisdiction as deputy auditor extended also over New Jersey. In New Jersey Fauconier was receiver general.

² The spirit in which Byerly went to work is indicated by a letter of his to the lord high treasurer, Nov. 30, 1703. He said that he had begun to frame a rent roll and found that, of the few whom he had registered, most had paid no rents since the patents were granted. Some were 16 or 18 years in arrears. Grantees also were very backward in registering and he designed to give in a list of some in every county to be prosecuted for neglect. Theoretically this was admirable, but it would surely have caused trouble for Byerly if other issues had not diverted his attention. Cal. Treas. Papers.

³ See Blathwayt's Journal, May 23, 1704, and later correspondence concerning New York's finances; especially Blathwayt's report to the lord treasurer, Jan. 31, 1704/5.

During the first year of this administration the commissioners for executing the office of collector, with Fauconier at their head, transacted the fiscal business of the province under the direction of the governor. The council did not know what was going on or calmly acquiesced in what was submitted for its approval. The system of prerogative control over expenditure came into full swing. It was essentially the same system which had always existed in New York, and in the provinces generally, but in the hands of Cornbury what was dwelt upon for a generation or more as the "misapplication" of revenue was carried on more shamelessly than ever, till his name became a synonym for extravagance and dishonesty.

The first instance of this kind was the submission of bills to the amount of £2194 to meet the expenditures on the governor's first visit to Albany, in August, 1702, to confer with the Five Nations. This was clearly an exorbitant sum, far exceeding earlier charges for similar conferences. The charges for firewood and candles for the garrisons were also high. The council supinely consented to the cost of a journey of the governor to New Jersey being defrayed out of the revenue of New York. Under the orders of the governor and without even waiting for the issue of warrants, large sums were paid out by Fauconier, and when he came to make up his accounts extraordinary measures were required. To meet this situation and also to insure the payment of several warrants which had been drawn in favor of Fauconier himself, Cornbury obtained from the council, June 19, 1704,¹ direction for the issue of an order to the deputy auditor to allow all such warrants as the commissioners should present to him, "notwithstanding the said warrants have been issued by me in Council since the supersession of the Commissioners by Byerly and are directed to be paid by them." The petition of the commissioners at this time set forth "the disinterested reasons that made them advance these considerable sums for the credit of the government," and their urgent need of relief. Preferential warrants had been known in New York before, but now they were being used on a larger scale and with a system not before known. Under any conditions the practice was a poor one, and now it was evidently being carried on with dishonest intent.

¹ Ex. C. Min.; N. Y. Col. MSS., pp. 49, 127.

Byerly was now in the province as collector and receiver general, and the council, under the lead of the governor, ordered him at his peril to make these warrants preferable in payment to all others, except those for the salaries of civil officers. Byerly informed both the council and the former commissioners that the revenue was not sufficient for the discharge of all these claims; if he paid salaries first and allowed the warrants of firewood contractors to be received for customs, he could not pay the demands of the commissioners, even though they had preferable warrants. He desired the council to inform him what order he should follow.

To complicate the situation still further, Cornbury in the summer of 1704 ordered a detachment from the militia sent to Albany after the assembly had failed to pass an act for this purpose.¹ The expenditures for this made the prospect of the payment of Fauconier's demand less probable and he became correspondingly more insistent. Cornbury had already written to the board of trade that he had many causes of complaint against Byerly and had understood that Byerly was making representations against him. The immediate result was the suspension of Byerly by the governor, in April, 1705, upon an alleged technical violation of an act of trade.² Fauconier was now made sole commissioner for executing the duties of the office thus made vacant, while he was also collector and receiver general of New Jersey. Warrants for a large part of the sums of which he stood in such dire need were at once issued to him. Blathwayt had already condemned various of the early expenditures of Cornbury as excessive and had declared that they ought not to be allowed. Clarke had stated to Blathwayt that he was reduced to a position of impotence, for he could only allow or disallow warrants after they were paid,¹ and urged that some method be found by which accounts might be submitted to him before the issue of the governor's warrant and expenditures other than those approved by the auditor general's office prohibited. As things were, he was subjected to the frowns of the governor and must disobey that official or betray the trust reposed in him. The lord treasurer also wrote to Cornbury that, as Byerly was a revenue officer, he should not have been suspended until the treasury had first been informed of the cause thereof.²

¹ Ex. C. Min., July 18, 1704.

² Cal. of Treas. Papers, June 13, 1705.

Upon his suspension Byerly went to England, where he made up his accounts. The treasury was already considering the New York accounts for the years immediately before Byerly's arrival there, and Clarke was ordered to send an answer on each head, "such as may be satisfactory to the Treasurer, that the accounts may be stated and passed." He was told to be "particularly Satisfied of every Disbursement," and to send the necessary information in all extraordinary matters, that the Lord Treasurer might give directions intelligently wherever he saw cause for retrenching any expense. It was also made clear in the case of Robert Livingston that warrants would not be accepted in payment of customs. The relative position of the parties to an accounting was set forth in the direction, that each account should be stated and sworn to by the collector before the governor or chief justice, then examined, audited and signed by the deputy auditor, and finally viewed by the governor in council and signed by them.

Byerly was absent from New York for two years, when he was sent back with an order to the governor to restore him to his office. During the interval Cornbury, Fauconier and their friends in the council had managed affairs as they wished. During an absence of Clarke in Virginia the council had audited the accounts of Fauconier which were in dispute. In spite of objections from the auditor general, the council ordered Fauconier to continue paying a salary to the second judge of the supreme court till positive commands to the contrary came from England. Sums were "borrowed" from the revenue on the credit of acts of assembly and were made payable to persons to whom preferential warrants were granted. Throughout this time there was no available check on the extravagance and favoritism which prevailed.

¹ N. Y. Col. MSS.

² Blathwayt's Journal, Jan. 15, 1705/6.

When Byerly returned with the approval of the home government and secured a proclamation from the council that he was fully restored, this system could no longer be worked.¹ A violent conflict at once began which lasted until 1708, when the question was taken up in both houses of the legislature. When the custom house was transferred to Byerly, Fauconier retained the book which contained the transactions of his own time, giving as his reason that his accounts were not settled. Byerly refused to receive any of the books without this one, and thereupon Fauconier locked them all up in the desk of the naval office. He also detained certain recognizances or bonds for the payment of excise from innkeepers in several counties. Though these were yet unpaid, Fauconier alleged that he had advanced the money on them out of his own pocket. He offered to deliver them to Byerly if the latter would secure to him the balance he alleged was due him from the queen. Byerly considered that Fauconier was repeating his former tactics of advancing money and charging the queen therefor in his accounts and depending on the council to get his accounts passed. Byerly therefore refused to have anything to do with these recognizances. He also refused to receive warrants for customs and countermanded arrangements for payments which had been made by Fauconier in the matter of the excise. This brought him into conflict with Peter Schuyler and Rip Van Dam. The governor and council of course were hostile, Cornbury finding him quite "unaccountable." On November 20, 1707, on an information that he intended to leave the province and carry with him what money he had of the revenue, he was arrested.

¹ On acknowledging that Byerly was restored to his office Cornbury wrote to the lord high treasurer that, in suspending him, he did not think he was encroaching on his lordship's authority. In the future he would follow the method prescribed, but he begged directions as to what he should do if the collector would not pay warrants issued to him by the governor and council. Cal. Treas. Papers.

On this and other occasions he was compelled to give security to the amount of over £4000.¹

As the revenue was near expiring, all who had claims against the government were striving to secure payment, and prominent among these was Fauconier, who claimed to have nearly £2000 due him. Pressure was brought to bear by the governor on Byerly to present his accounts to the deputy auditor, but the collector protested that he could not do this until he was in possession of all the books and papers which had been detained by Fauconier. Cornbury seems also to have persuaded Quarry to interfere in the affair by ordering Byerly to allow Fauconier the balance he claimed. This Byerly refused to do and maintained himself stoutly against his prosecutors. Such of Fauconier's accounts as were presented to the deputy auditor were objected to for many reasons, while a difficulty arose as to the fees which were charged in auditing. This led to a prolonged dispute concerning the amount of salary which was due to Blathwayt from New York, whether it was 5% on the sum audited or a flat sum the amount of which is variously stated at from £100 to £200 per annum.

Byerly also brought charges in England against Fauconier of so serious a nature as to cause the treasury to issue an order to the governor for his prosecution. This aroused Cornbury to inspect Byerly's accounts, with the result that he claimed to find evidence of frauds to the amount of £52! This was the heaviest stroke which he could deliver against the collector, while he wrote to the lord treasurer that "nothing should be wanting to see his Lordship's commands fully obeyed" in reference to Fauconier.² The collector must have been confirmed in his unyielding attitude by knowledge of the opposition which was gathering against Cornbury, not only in official circles but throughout the province. An occasion for this was forcibly stated in the summer of 1707 by Robert Livingston in a letter which, for prudential reasons, he dispatched from Connecticut to Lowndes, the secretary of the treasury.¹ He described the absurd and unaccountable conduct of the governor, as well as his wasteful expenditure of the revenue, telling how he was wholly addicted to pleasure, enriching himself by strange and unheard of methods, keeping some few creatures about him whose counsel he followed to the grief of the principal inhabitants. They wished he was not so closely related to the queen. One result which Livingston foretold was that, when the revenue expired the following May, the assembly would not revive it. In the following October Champante wrote that the ministry was well apprised of Cornbury's maladministration in New York, and that "the push we lately made here hath given a shock to his lordship's interest." He was of opinion that, if the gentlemen of New York would make regular and public complaint, they would rid themselves of Cornbury. The chief difficulty felt by persons in power in England was, that "they knew not what to do with Her Majesty's cousin when they had him here."²

¹ N. Y. Docs. V, 28. Cornbury then wrote to the lord high treasurer that Byerly refused to pay anyone, that both the governor and the chief justice were unable to get their salaries. He would not produce his books or accounts as formerly. Cornbury to Lord High Treasurer, Nov. 24, Dec. 20, 1707; Byerly to B. T., Dec. 13, 1707. Cal. Treas. Papers. In C. O. 5/1048, Z9 and 10, are Cornbury's warrant for Byerly's arrest and the order removing his suspension. His suspension from the duties of his office continued from November to February, during which time Fauconier again officiated.

² Cal. Treas. Papers, July 4, 1708.

On August, 1708, this controversy was brought before both houses of the legislature. The council was the first to act,³ apparently on the initiation of Cornbury and his friends, for the purpose of bringing Byerly to account. Some fifteen questions were put to the council and the answers of each councillor and of the governor were entered in the minutes. These related chiefly to the conduct of Fauconier, Byerly and Clarke, but also to granting Fauconier the power to receive what was due on the recognizances which he held, and to a possible successor to Byerly. Wenham, Schuyler, Beekman and Van Dam voted regularly with the governor, and on some of the questions Barbarie was with them. Mompesson and Phillips, and in some cases Barbarie, were on the other side. Wenham was the spokesman for the majority, the governor also frequently expressing his views, which in every case were more extreme than those of the councillors. The majority upheld the view that warrants issued by the governor, with the approval of the council, were binding in all cases and should be paid unless the crown ordered to the contrary. They therefore condemned Byerly's course, approved the conduct of Fauconier and all his claims, and advised that Byerly should be again suspended. On the question of Fauconier's claims, however, it required the casting vote of the governor to decide the case. The decision went that specific directions from the treasury in England to one of its representatives in the colonies must yield before general discretion reposed in the governor and his advisers. The minority insisted that these matters did not properly come before them, but must be referred to the crown; when, as in this case, there was conflict of jurisdiction, the crown must decide. No one advised that the receipt of revenue should be placed in the hands of Fauconier, but instead De Peyster, the province treasurer, who was responsible to the assembly, was preferred.

¹ Cal. of Treas. Papers, June 2, 1707. It was in this letter that the account was given of Cornbury's public appearances in women's clothes and of the extent to which he was running personally in debt.

² Rawlinson MSS.; Champante to Mompesson.

³ Journal of Leg. C. I, 251 et seq.

The attitude of the assembly toward these matters in some respects resembled that of the council, but yet differed from it in very characteristic fashion.¹ The conduct of Byerly respecting the payment of warrants on the ordinary revenue was brought before it by petitions from several inhabitants, especially those of Schuyler, Van Dam, Ebenezer Willson and Lancaster Symes.² Of course this also brought up the attitude of Fauconier toward these payments and the expenditures made by the executive from the revenue raised for extraordinary purposes. Prolonged hearings were held on the case of Byerly and by him and Clarke the statements bearing on the question, which had come from Blathwayt and the British government, were laid before the assembly. It finally agreed with the council in condemning Byerly's refusal to allow warrants for customs, but as to the rest of his conduct they did not find him guilty of any crime, though he had been guilty of many omissions and erroneous acts and by his partiality had defeated the efforts of the complainants to obtain the moneys which had been allowed them by the governor and council. That this resolution was intended to be an approval of Byerly's attitude in the main, while to satisfy the friends of Cornbury it condemned him in particulars, is shown by the action of the house on the subject of the "misapplication" of the extraordinary revenue.

¹ Ass. J. I, 221, 225 et seq., 229, 231-233, 236.

² Willson was Cornbury's appointee — in the year 1707 — to the office of mayor of New York, and Symes was a lieutenant of one of the independent companies.

On the credit of the £1800 act of 1702 Rip Van Dam and Colonel William Peartree advanced sums to the colony at 10% interest. In 1708 the committee of the house found that, including Peartree's loan, the commissioners of the revenue had received under this act £2182.19.7, and under the governor's orders had paid several persons £1471.9.7 for which they had no warrants. The difference between the two sums is £711.10.5, which is the sum ordered to be refunded by an act of 1708,¹ on the ground that it had been borrowed on the credit of the tax of 1702 and had been expended or "misapplied" and now stood as a debt on the revenue. A bill was also introduced to oblige all the collectors and receivers general and commissioners for executing that office to refund the money by them received and not applied to the uses for which the taxes were raised;² but this got no further than a second reading. At the instance of Willson and Symes, who desired to obtain payment of firewood warrants for the garrison and who alleged before the council that Byerly was wrongfully detaining over £1000 as his salary for the time before his arrival in the province and during his suspension, a bill was introduced into the assembly to compel him to refund all such sums, but it was not passed.³ The same bill had passed the council on the casting vote of the governor.

But the house endorsed the dispatch in 1704, on the sole authority of the governor, of a detachment of militia to Albany when the assembly had failed to provide for the defence of the frontier. Hendrick Hansen had presented a bill for something over £250 for the subsistence of this detachment, and in the session of 1708 an act was passed for raising this amount by special tax and appropriating it for the payment of Hansen's bill.

¹ Col. Laws, I, 627.

² Ass. J. I, 237.

³ Ibid., 238. C. J. I, 271-273. In England, on this question, Blathwayt stood pat and in a report to the lord high treasurer implied that the salary should be divided between Byerly and Fauconier. But Northey held that the entire salary belonged to Byerly and that Fauconier's claim should be disallowed. A warrant agreeable to Northey's report was made out. Cal. of Treas. Papers, Jan. 28, 1709/10, March 22, 1710/11.

The Byerly episode and the session of 1708 revealed in a clearer light than any earlier events the laxity of financial administration under Cornbury. It had much in common with the earlier administrations, but the governor, supported by a majority of interested parties in the council, carried the system to greater lengths than earlier executives. Imperial audit proved inadequate to check the confusion and extravagance which prevailed under the system of executive warrants and preferred payments. As suspicion and opposition arose, the assembly was looked to as offering the only prospect of relief. The reaction first expressed itself in the creation of the office of treasurer and the rejection of the claim — now again repeated — that the council had the right to amend money bills. But the jurisdiction of the treasurer, and through him of the assembly, was at first confined to extraordinary grants, while the ordinary revenue was left to the old methods of control, such as we have seen operating in Cornbury's time. The irregularities which followed were so great that they gave rise to the demand for control through the treasurer and assembly over all the revenue, ordinary as well as extraordinary. It was generally reported that £1500 raised for the batteries at the Narrows was spent by Cornbury in the erection of a pleasure house on Nutten island. Such a house was built, but the source from which came the moderate sum that seems to have been expended on it is not known. "Misapplication" became the cry,¹ and it was repeated in succeeding administrations till it became a tradition and as such an abiding element in the constitutional growth of New York. This strengthened antagonism toward the council and promoted a belief in the omnipotence of the assembly. The tradition of English liberties, of the right of private property and of the freeholders to a control through their representatives over the expenditure of revenue, fell in naturally with this tendency.

¹ Colls. of N. Y. Hist. Soc., Fund Series, 1868, p. 204; Clarendon MSS. 102, ff. 54, 88b; Ass. J. I, 208, 213.

These combined ideas were fully expressed in a report of the committee of grievances which was unanimously adopted as resolutions of the house, September 11, 1708.¹ They condemned the appointment of coroners rather than their election, the erection of a court of equity without consent in general assembly, the collection of extravagant and unlimited fees which were not established by law, the imposing and levying of money under any pretence or color without the consent of the assembly. The protest of a mercantile community against imposts and heavy port charges on trade as an important source of revenue was also voiced in these resolutions, as a source of impoverishment to the colony and sure to prove its destruction.²

But in order fully to appreciate policy and methods of government as they were under Cornbury, one must also know what occurred in New Jersey, a province inhabited mostly by dissenters of British stock, where proprietary interests were strong and where the governor and his supporters ventured upon acts which they did not dare to perform in New York. In New Jersey there were a large number of proprietors. In West Jersey they comprised the landholders as a body and these were organized under leaders. In East New Jersey they had become numerous, part residing in Great Britain and part in the province. For this reason they continued to exercise what was practically a controlling influence over, not only the land, but the politics of the province after it had passed under the direct authority of the crown. The contrast between this situation and that in Maryland, with its single proprietor and its royal government, is sufficiently striking. It furnishes the chief explanation of the fortunes of Cornbury and his successors there, for about proprietary interests centered the leading conflicts of the entire royal period.

The group relations in the politics of New Jersey were very complicated.¹ This arose in part from the fact that it had consisted of two provinces which were now united, and in part from the variety of religious sects in the province. Many Scotch, as well as English, were also concerned, and in those days this involved much national and personal jealousy. The proprietors in both the original provinces were broken up into rival groups and so were the people, and the grouping was different on the two sides of the old dividing line. In East Jersey there were among the proprietors the Morris and Willocks group and the Dockwra and Sonmans group, the latter being small and its members residing mostly in Great Britain. The great body of the British proprietors stood behind Morris and his friends. On the other side of the line was the West Jersey Society with Basse and Coxe as its leaders, and the council of proprietors led by Jennings. Jennings was a leading Quaker, while Basse and Coxe — now identified with the Anglicans — were strongly opposed to that sect. The Morris party in East Jersey was made up chiefly of Presbyterians and Anglicans, but they cooperated politically with Jennings. Hence they were known among their opponents as “the Scotch and Quaker faction.” The alignment on the other side was between Dockwra, Sonmans and their following and the Coxe and Basse faction in West Jersey. Basse, as we have seen, had been the leader of the anti-proprietary forces before the establishment of royal government, while Andrew Hamilton had been the proprietary governor and leader. Hence they were sometimes called the Basse and Hamilton parties, though as early as the administration of which we are now to speak Morris and Coxe became the actual leaders.

¹ Ass. J. I, 223, 224.

² Fauconier seems to have remained many years in New York and to have turned his attention to land speculation. According to a memorial of Colden in 1721, Fauconier was then a sharer in extravagant grants to the extent of 400,000 acres or more. The Waywanda and other very large patents lying between the middle Hudson and the Delaware, were the scene of his speculations. C. O. 5/1053. Cc. 84.

In character these two men were not unlike. The immediate Welsh ancestors of Morris had been Cromwellians in England and later had become wealthy West Indian planters. Morris himself fell heir to the manor of Morrisania in New York, and to large estates, containing iron mines, in Monmouth county, New Jersey.² This, together with his energy, his wide acquaintance with business and his good practical knowledge of the law, explains his prominent connection with the politics of both the provinces where he had a residence. Coxe was the son of Dr. Daniel Coxe, who had been physician to the Princess Anne and who had purchased the rights of Edward Byllinge in New Jersey and sold his chief interests there to the West Jersey Society. The son, who had inherited his claims, had settled at Burlington and was a leader among the Anglicans and against the Quakers at that centre.

¹ This is most clearly set forth by Dr. Tanner in his Province of New Jersey, C. U. Studies, XXX, Chaps. 5, 7, 15, 19, 22. See also N. J. Arch. III, 275.

² See a memoir of him in Colls. of N. J. Hist. Soc., IV.

It was into this complex of groups and sects that Cornbury was introduced in 1703. He held all Quakers in contempt and considered that they were not fit to share in government, but he was bound by his instructions to admit them to office on their making the solemn declaration instead of taking the oaths. Toward dissenters in general he had no kindly feeling, though in New Jersey close cooperation with them was necessary, if anything was to be accomplished. On the other hand, Jerseymen naturally looked askance on any governor who came from New York, and were particularly restive if he did New Jersey business elsewhere than on its own soil. The governor, as the agent of imperialism, looked down on it as one of the "proprieties" and still partaking largely of that character, which it was his duty and privilege to train into regular ways and active loyalty. Also there was the personality of Cornbury himself, the lower depths of which were even more clearly revealed in New Jersey than in New York. In the effort to make headway among the factions of New Jersey an opportunity was presented for profit, as well as for oppression, which New York in some respects could not equal. In England the proprietary factions had contended over seats in the council, with the result that six of the twelve who were named in Cornbury's commission were prominent proprietors, and six were more or less out of sympathy with them. Among the former Morris and Jennings had places and among the latter were Bowne, of East Jersey, and Revell and Leeds of West Jersey, all anti-proprietary men. Robert Quarry, who was also a member, sided with the governor and strongly supported the anti-proprietary interest in his letters home, but by virtue of his office to an extent stood apart from the parties of the province.

The point upon which Cornbury first centered his attention was that of procuring a permanent and adequate revenue. His own salary, of course, bulked large in this program. But a salary system had never existed as a part of the very rudimentary finances of the Jerseys. In view of this, the assembly thought itself doing very well when it voted £1000 for the support of the government in general and £300 for the payment of representatives and for incidental charges, the grant to continue for one year only.¹ The next year it voted £1500 and £1000 for each of the two following years. With none of these votes was Cornbury satisfied.

In the election for this assembly the proprietary and anti-proprietary feeling, inherited from the previous struggle, ran high. A clique among the proprietors gave Cornbury a bribe of 200 pounds of plate in the hope that he would "nicely observe his instructions." The members of both divisions were chosen, not by counties or districts, but at large.² This enabled Thomas Gordon, sheriff of East Jersey, to fix the polls at a place in that division so inconvenient as to disfranchise many of the voters for that election. In West Jersey also the proprietary interest won, the result being everywhere facilitated by a high property qualification.³ Such tactics as those of Gordon certainly furnished a strong provocation for the opposing faction and they tried, though in vain, to unseat five of the proprietary members.

The first measure introduced into the assembly was the so-called "long bill,"⁴ the object of which was to confirm the claim of the proprietors to the land of the province and to quit rents, and put an end to the grants of Nicolls to the Elizabethtown and Monmouth patentees. The effect of this, of course, would be to reopen the struggle with the Nicolls patentees and that over a question which ought to have been

¹ Tanner, 320, 378, 502, with references.

² N. J. Arch. III, 14, 29, 195, 207-209, 276; Tanner, 321, 352 et seq., 378, 605.

³ This was 100 acres of land for electors and 1000 acres for the elected. Cornbury complained because there was not an alternative money qualification, so as to admit merchants.

⁴ N. J. Arch. III, 28 et seq. — Cornbury's criticism of this bill. The text of it is not now accessible; see Tanner, 606 et seq.

judicially settled. The object of the next bill was to prohibit the unlicensed purchase of land from the Indians. Other measures provided for enforcing the payment of a tax laid in 1700 for the support of government in West Jersey, the collection of which had been a failure, and for the payment of wages and fees to the members of the assembly. It was only after these that the meagre revenue for the year, to which reference has been made, was voted. This course of proceeding indicated that the proprietary element intended, if possible, to dominate the affairs of the province, even though a surrender of government had been made to the crown. It was certainly an exceptional situation, especially in the eyes of so pronounced an enemy of chartered colonies as was Cornbury. He therefore approved only the bill concerning purchases from the Indians and closed the session. Through Quarry he then negotiated with the anti-proprietary party and obtained from them an assurance that at the next election they would choose men who would vote the government an adequate support and otherwise effectually answer its ends.

The assembly did not meet again until September, 1704.¹ In his opening speech Cornbury asked for an adequate revenue and said that he did not think the rights of the proprietors should be confirmed in the way provided by the bill of the last session. Legislation concerning the militia and highways was also called for. These matters the house took up, but also introduced bills concerning the rights of the proprietors, with much the same provisions as those of the last session. The support offered was but slightly increased. Thoroughly disgusted and offering as an excuse that he must at once return to New York, he dissolved the assembly and ordered a new election.

As was proved by evidence collected three years later,² the so-called "blind tax" had already been levied, that is, a corruption fund of several hundred pounds had been raised by the anti-proprietary party — chiefly by Richard Slater and John Bowne — for the purpose of securing the dissolution of the assembly and the election of another which should be opposed to the proprietors. Cornbury denied that he had received any of this money,¹ but in view of his character, of the circumstances of the case and of what occurred afterwards, his statement was generally disbelieved. But notwithstanding their efforts, and the haste with which it was held, Cornbury and his friends were not wholly successful in the election.² Therefore objection was made to the seating of three Quakers from West Jersey, in the session of November, 1704, on the plea that they did not possess the requisite amount of land. Upon this suggestion from two of his supporters, Cornbury refused to receive the affirmations of the three Quakers. Thereupon their accusers desired fourteen days in which to prove their charge; and this was granted, though the day following the accused members produced the surveys which proved that they were qualified. Their temporary exclusion, however, gave a majority of one to the anti-proprietary party and enabled it to pass a bill extending the suffrage to freeholders without further qualification. Acts were also passed for the taxation of all land in the province, including the unimproved land of the proprietors, and for raising £2000 per annum for two years for the support of the government.³ The session was then brought to an end without the excluded members being allowed to qualify. Though proprietary exclusiveness had been dealt a merited blow, it had been done by such high-handed methods as to discredit the men who were concerned in it. The acts of this session went for a time into force, but finally they were all disallowed, while Cornbury was instructed to restore the former restrictions on the suffrage,⁴ with alternative qualifications expressed in terms of money.

¹ N. J. Arch. III, 66.

² N. J. Arch. III, 179, 198-219; Tanner, 609.

The assembly did not meet again till the close of 1705.⁵ By that time it had become convinced that the claim of the three excluded members to their seats was valid and they were restored in spite of all the dishonest efforts of Cornbury to prevent it. By this means the proprietary majority was reestablished.

¹ N. J. Arch. III, 194. Morris stated that Chief Justice Bridges, of New York, encouraged the raising of this fund; ibid., 277.

² Ibid., 87 et seq.; Tanner, 382 et seq.

³ N. J. Arch. III, 69.

⁴ N. J. Arch. III, 98; Tanner, 386.

⁵ Tanner, 383 et seq.

In his first letter home concerning the doings of this assembly, Cornbury made no reference to the exclusion of the three members.¹ But he did describe, from his standpoint, the quarrel in which he had already become involved with Lewis Morris and the suspension of him from the council. Morris was doubtless stirred to action by knowledge of the underhanded proceedings of Cornbury, and he began his assault with the claim that the surrender by the proprietors had been made on conditions and that these had been incorporated in the governor's instructions. These he asserted that Cornbury was violating. The instructions in question related not so much to the territorial rights of the proprietors, which of course would be conceded by all, as to the political requirements embodied in the former property qualification for suffrage and the right of Quakers to vote and hold office. The very prominent place held by Morris in the negotiations for the surrender entitled him to speak with weight upon the intentions of the proprietors at that time, and he now asserted that they intended to make these and the articles concerning territorial rights conditions of the surrender. They were certainly presented at the time and were included in Cornbury's instructions.² But they were not in the document embodying the surrender itself and the board of trade asserted that the surrender "was absolute and without Terms." "We did indeed consent, at the Proprietors' desire, to add some Clauses to Your Lordship's Instructions, but that was no condition of the Surrender." This statement of the board was undoubtedly correct. It was in harmony with all the possibilities and probabilities of its action. It never could have pledged itself to perpetuate the very control over the government of New Jersey which the proprietors were resigning. And furthermore, the instructions themselves provided that the restrictions on suffrage might be changed by law. The fact that Cornbury had procured the passage of such a law is not to be condemned, though the way in which he did it was open to the severest censure. But the proprietors, as well as the anti-proprietary party, had their share in bribing him. As to the Quakers, he never really attempted to disfranchise them, though doubtless he gladly would have done so. These were the two important conditions which Morris insisted upon, and they both lay within the sphere of government, where the hands of the crown could not be tied by any mere understanding.

¹ N. J. Arch. III, 69 et seq.; Tanner, 263, 383.

² N. J. Arch. II, 406, 452, 510; III, 74, 117, 125; Tanner, 603 et seq.

The home government,¹ when it learned how Cornbury had excluded the three members, advised him not to interfere with the privileges of the house, but it supported him and the anti-proprietary party by appointing three Anglicans — Townley, Coxe and Chief Justice Mompesson — to the council. Cornbury was ordered by the board of trade to restore Morris on his making due submission, but it was not made and he did not attend until the next administration.² Jennings resigned and joined Morris in the leadership of the proprietary forces. Peter Sonmans was the anti-proprietary candidate for Jennings' place, was also recommended by Cornbury and was ultimately appointed. He was a man of ability, but of low moral character. He became one of the most notorious of the Cornbury clique, and later found the greatest difficulty in keeping himself out of the clutches of the law.³

When the assembly met for the fall session of 1705, it soon became evident that the affair of the three members had destroyed all chance of the governor obtaining from it any of the legislation which he desired. It began at once the preparation of bills to confirm the rights of the proprietors and would not consider appropriations till they were passed. The consequence was a prorogation till the next spring, and this assembly never again met for business. In October, 1706, an effort was made to bring a quorum together, but it failed and a dissolution followed. Cornbury's third assembly, which was now elected, contained a strong proprietary majority. Morris, who was under suspension from the council, was returned as a member, and Jennings was elected speaker. These two were the leaders of the house. The proposals of Cornbury's opening speech, that they should appropriate a revenue for 21 years and pass other beneficial laws,⁴ were brushed one

¹ N. J. Arch, III, 85, 112, 127, 137.

² Ibid., 124.

³ Tanner, 266 and references. On the struggle which went on in England between Dockwra, Sonmans and the Coxe interests among the proprietors over these appointments, see Tanner, 613 et seq. and references.

⁴ Tanner, 387 et seq.; N. J. Arch. III, 197.

side and they went into committee of the whole on grievances. The committee appointed its own clerk and thus, after a struggle with Cornbury, got rid of his clerk, the clerk of the house, who declared that he was sworn to report debates which were dangerous to the government. The committee then settled down to the taking of evidence concerning the "blind tax" and the exclusion of the three members. John Bowne, one of the collectors of it, was expelled from the house and other vigorous measures were resorted to. An address to the queen was prepared asking for the removal of the governor,¹ and a remonstrance, prepared mostly by Morris, was read to Cornbury himself by the speaker in the presence of the house. In this remarkable document his lordship was charged with a number of offences, such as the arbitrary collection of fees, granting a monopoly of trade on the road from Amboy to Burlington and interfering with the business and records of the proprietors, but the indictment reached its climax in the charge that in return for a large bribe he had excluded the three members from the assembly.

Very rarely was a governor assailed to his face in this fashion, and it must have required much self control on Cornbury's part to have mastered his anger sufficiently to state that he would need time in which to prepare his reply. In due time he read it before the house,² though who had the largest share in preparing it is not known. It was skilfully drawn and abounded in denunciation of his leading opponents, criticism of the assembly and justification of his own conduct. He pleaded his instructions and sought to justify his claim to judge of the qualifications of assemblymen. As to the "blind tax," he absolutely denied all knowledge of it or share in it.

A controversy next developed over the submission to the assembly of the accounts of Fauconier, the receiver general. On its refusal to consider appropriations until his accounts were laid before the house, they were produced. The house then called on Fauconier for his vouchers, but he refused to give them without Cornbury's consent. He was appealed to, but replied that the receiver general was accountable alone to the auditor general.³ The house then, without voting any appropriations, turned to the preparation of bills confirming the estates of the proprietors, ascertaining fees and the qualifications of jurymen. Cornbury thereupon prorogued them. An equally profitless session was held in the autumn, the deadlock continuing over the redress of grievances.

¹ N. J. Arch., III, 171 et seq.

³ Tanner, 393.

² N. J. Arch., III, 180 et seq.

Both parties now turned to the home government, Morris writing to the secretary of state a comprehensive account of the administration from his standpoint, and the governor sending an address to the queen¹ from the lieutenant governor and council. While the latter representation was filled with complaints of the turbulence of Morris and Jennings and the factions and confusion in both the Jerseys and Pennsylvania, Morris laid the blame on the governors. Their imprudent conduct, sordid and mercenary measures, "the trash of mankind" who had been their favorites and tools, these had checked the growth of the provinces and filled the chartered governments with people who had emigrated from them; Cornbury's administration he compared to that of Gessius Florus in Judea and asked that he be recalled.

In May, 1708, another brief session of the assembly was held at Burlington,² in which the demands of the governor and the protest and statement of grievances of the house were simply repeated and no business was done. With this the experience of Cornbury with assemblies in New Jersey came to an end, for before the house met again he had been called back to England.

¹ N. J. Arch., III, 274-290.

² N. J. Arch., III, 291-298.

CHAPTER XIX

HARMONY PARTIALLY RESTORED IN NEW YORK AND NEW JERSEY UNDER ROBERT HUNTER, 1708-1716

DURING the brief administrations of Lord Lovelace and Richard Ingoldsby, which intervened between the retirement of Cornbury and the arrival of Hunter — December, 1708, to June, 1710 — attention was chiefly occupied with preparations for the expedition of Vetch and Nicholson against Canada. This was welcomed as offering a fair prospect of conquest and thus of removing the burden of war or at least the agitation which resulted from frequent alarms. But it imposed a heavy financial burden on the province, and that at a time when its debt was large and its credit was low. Naturally, therefore, the assembly, by taking advantage of the need for revenue, was able to strengthen still further its control over the finances. The new governor expressed the hope that the revenue would be continued for a six year period, as in Lord Bellomont's time, and that the debt might be paid off.¹ During many sessions the house considered the question of supply in committee of the whole² and finally it was resolved to appropriate £2500 and that £1600 of this, since he had brought over a large quantity of military supplies, should go to the governor, while the salaries of a number of minor officials were specified. The balance (£750) was set apart for firewood, candles and other incidentals for the garrisons at Albany. Having determined the uses to which the supply should be put, the house resolved itself into committee of the whole on the ways and means of procuring the supply. At this point occurred the death of Lord Lovelace and the assumption of the government by Richard Ingoldsby.³

¹ Ass. J. I, 240; C. J. I, 276; Col. Laws, I, 420.

² Ass. J. I, 246.

³ Ingoldsby's commission, as is stated below, had been revoked in 1706, but notice of the fact seems not to have been sent to him. As soon as the board of trade learned of this act of his the queen ordered him to lay down the office; N. Y. Docs. V, 89-91.

The next step taken by the assembly was the passage of a very elaborate act regulating and establishing fees, which was intended to reduce the extortionate sums collected in this form, of which there had been such general complaint under Cornbury. It was approved by the acting governor and council without amendment.¹ But already Colonels Vetch and Nicholson had arrived. Ingoldsby threw himself into their plans and the estimates had to be changed. A bill was now passed appropriating £6000 for the expedition, to be paid out by the treasurer or upon warrants under the hands of commissioners named in the act.² They were to procure provisions and other necessities for victualling the forces, to build storehouses near Lake Champlain and attend to transporting the troops. The warrants were to state to whom, for what service and for what materials they were issued. A committee of three at Albany was also named in the act to receive the supplies and dispose of them there and to the northward. The treasurer was to keep accounts and submit them to the governor, council and assembly when called for.³ Not the least significant departure from former usage in this session and under the pressure of war was the passage of the first act in New York for the issue of bills of credit.⁴

In the autumn session, when the expedition had been abandoned and the troops had returned, all officials who had been concerned with the expenditure of money were called on to account.⁵ Carpenters petitioned for pay. The house addressed the lieutenant governor to take effective measures for the return to Albany of the stores of war sent to Wood Creek and that exact accounts for them should be rendered. In a strong and detailed address to the queen the house set forth what New York had done and the condition of need in which she found herself, now that the enterprise had been abandoned.⁶ Additional taxes were then laid — a tonnage duty, a chimney and hearth tax and a tax on slaves, and more bills

¹ Col. Laws, I, 638 et seq.

² Ibid., 654; Ass. J. I, 268.

³ Later in the session an act for levying £4,000 additional was passed, with provisions substantially the same as this act; Col. Laws, I, 669.

⁴ Ibid., 666.

⁵ Ass. J. I, 261 et seq.

⁶ Ibid., 268.

of credit were issued.¹ To this point had the war brought the fiscal system of the province when Governor Robert Hunter appeared.

Hunter was a Scotchman of good family and training, honest, tactful and possessed of a considerable degree of culture. Cadwallader Colden wrote, many years after,² "When I knew Mr. Hunter he was an exceedingly well shaped and well proportioned man, tho' then advanced in years. He understood the Belles lettres well and had an intimacy with the distinguished men of wit at that time in England. Among them Dr. Arbuthnot, Queen Anne's favorite physician, was his most intimate and useful friend, tho' he and the doctor differed greatly in their political sentiments, for Mr. Hunter was a staunch Whig. He wrote some pieces in the Tatlers. When he was appointed Governor of New York a very high compliment was made in one of the Tatlers to him under the name of Eboracensis.³ He wrote some elegant little pieces of poetry, which never appeared in his name. He had an exceeding pretty and entertaining manner of telling a Tale and was a most agreeable companion with his intimate friends. He was fond of men of Learning and encouraged them whenever he had an opportunity. In short he was a Gentleman of extraordinary abilities, both natural and acquired, and had every qualification requisite in a Governor."

This passage has merited quotation in full, because the sources for our period rarely yield characterizations so adequate as this of governors and other leaders who were at that time active in the colonies. The young Colden, who had a strong taste for learning, as well as for official life, was himself the son of a Scotch parson, had studied medicine in Edinburgh and had migrated to Philadelphia where, rather unwillingly, he was settling down with the idea of passing his life as a practitioner of the healing art.⁴ But in the latter part of Hunter's administration he invited Colden to remove to New York on the promise of being the next surveyor general. Two minor offices were first bestowed upon

¹ Col. Laws, I, 669, 675, 682, 689, 695.

² Colden's Letters to his Son on Smith's History of New York, Colls. of N. Y. Hist. Soc. Fund Series, 1868, p. 192 et seq.; Dict. of National Biography.

³ This is in No. 69 of the Tatler.

⁴ Keys, Cadwallader Colden as an Eighteenth Century Official.

him and in 1720, after Hunter had returned to England, but at the governor's instance, the coveted appointment was made and Colden was launched upon his long official career. This fact, as well as the social charm of Hunter, helps to explain the enthusiasm with which, as an elderly man, Colden recalled the memory of the governor. He went on in his sketch to tell how Hunter had served in the army during William's reign and later under Marlborough, from Blenheim to Ramillies, and added, evidently from his recollection of the stories as told by Hunter, some incidents showing his relations with the great duke himself. He might also have added that he knew Addison and Swift and was on familiar terms with the earls of Stair. Colden did record his belief that Hunter was the ablest man who had ever governed New York. In 1707 he was appointed full-rank governor of Virginia, but, being captured by the French, did not reach that province.¹ Subsequent to his service in New York he was made governor of Jamaica and served there till his death in 1734. His letters show literary ability and the firmness and success with which he approached a difficult situation in both New York and New Jersey show him to have been a man of unusual capacity. His coming was immediately connected with the settlement in New York of a considerable body of Palatines, but that is best treated in other connections, and it is our task at present to consider Hunter in his relation to the political problems which he had to face in New York and New Jersey.

In September, 1710, Hunter met his first New York assembly.² In his opening speech he referred to them a letter from Governor Dudley of Massachusetts describing the barbarities from which the frontiers of New England were suffering and asking that the New York Indians might make a diversion against the French for their relief. Hunter stated that he had consulted the Indian commissioners at Albany and had found that, if the attention of the French was diverted to New York, it would be found much less defensible than New England, "there being neither money in the Treasury nor Forts, or what is worse than none, no Arms or Men for our Defence; so that we are forced to rest contented with a precarious

¹ N. Y. Col. Docs., V, 451-455; Colden, op. cit.

² Ass. J. I, 271 et seq.

Security, under a suspicious Neutrality that hath no firmer Foundation than the Faith of Savages, whilst our Neighbours' Frontiers are on Fire and the Inhabitants inhumanly butchered." In the light of such an utterance as that, the failure of the Fletcher and Cornbury régime stood fully revealed. It is probable that the stolid and narrowly self-interested Dutch and English who heard it failed to catch its true meaning. New England was bearing the brunt of the conflict, and however faulty may have been its system of defence, the money which was appropriated for it was not stolen. It was spent in some form or other for the purposes intended. Both Fletcher and Cornbury could write brave letters home about what ought to be done and filled with complaints of their neighbors because it was not done, while they were in league with a group of corruptionists to divert a large part of the meagre funds which could be obtained to their own pockets. At Albany trade with the French and their Indians was too valuable to be risked by war. In view of this, and of the interests which absorbed the energies of England in Europe, is it any wonder that Canada was not conquered?

As had been done so many times before, Hunter urged the necessity of repairing the forts and building new ones, and that the militia act, which was about to expire, should be renewed. The debt, too, with which Cornbury had left the province burdened, though New York had had very little real share in the war, ought to be paid. Among certain acts the passage of which Hunter had been instructed, if possible, to secure was one whereby the creditors of persons becoming bankrupt in Great Britain and having estates in New York might be able to recover their debts. This touched a very real and widespread evil connected with colonial trade and business relations. Also the home government had again ordered that no law be passed making presents to governors. To these proposals as a whole the assembly made the usual brief answer, showing good intentions in general, but no specific resolve to act out of the ordinary.

The first subject taken up was that of fees. Hunter had brought over an order in council repealing the act of 1709 on that subject.¹ This was an expression of what had always been the policy of the British government, that the rates of fees should be fixed by the colonial executives. It opposed such legislation as this, wherever it appeared, as an encroachment on the sphere of the executive. But fees had recently become too extortionate and the system sheltered too many evils for the colonists to refrain from repeated attacks upon it. In accordance with the suggestion of the board of trade, the council prepared a new table of fees, based on an earlier one of 1693, while the assembly set about another bill on the subject.¹ While it was found that no ordinance had ever been issued authorizing the collection of the fees of 1693, and it was impossible to base a new table on that list, the assembly did not succeed in securing the passage of another act on the subject and the next year a new table of fees was put into force by executive ordinance.

¹ New York Docs. V. 143: Ass. J. I. 274.

Immediately after this subject was disposed of, that of the governor's salary came up. The assembly resolved that 2500 ounces of plate—that is of silver of the standard weight and fineness of Spanish coin—equivalent to 6s. 10d. per oz. should be raised for the payment of the governor during the coming year.² As Hunter, following the specification when Cornbury was appointed, had been instructed to take £1200 sterling out of the revenue for his salary, and this resolve of the house implied a return to the salary of about two-thirds of that sum, he called the houses before him and told the assembly that he thought he had done nothing to deserve such a vote and he hoped no one would dispute the right of the queen to appoint a salary for her governor, as had been done in her instructions. Other serious cuts were also made by the assembly in the sums deemed necessary by the executive for the support of the government. It was at this time that Lewis Morris, who had so bitterly opposed Cornbury in New Jersey and who had now removed to the county of Westchester in New York, struck hands with Hunter and in the assembly criticised so severely those who opposed the governor's demand concerning his salary that he was expelled.³ The two, however, continued in close connection,

¹ Ass. J. I, 274, 279; N. Y. Docs. V, 170, 186, 216, 238.

² Ass. J., I, 280-1; C. J., I, 302; N. Y. Docs., V, 177-180, 183, 191.

³ N. Y. Docs., V, 178; Ass. J. I, 283. A copy of the speech which Morris delivered on this occasion was sent by Hunter to the board of trade as an en-

in both New York and New Jersey affairs, and it was as the result chiefly of their joint efforts that Hunter was finally able to secure a working agreement with the various political groups in the two provinces.¹

Closely connected with the question of his own salary was that of the debt due the widow of Lord Lovelace for his salary and expenditures as governor. The day before his death a resolution granting him £1600 had passed the assembly, but later, under Ingoldsby, the same had been cut down by more than two-thirds. An order had now come from the queen that the assembly should be called upon to make good its former resolution.² This Hunter laid before that body and, as an encouragement to liberality, referred to the enrichment of the province which might be expected from the settlement of the Palatines within it. Following a recommendation of the board of trade, he urged that a general act for their naturalization be passed,³ and from that he went on to a further argument in favor of expenditures for defence. Though several revenue acts were passed, in the opinion of Hunter they would not meet the current expenditures, even according to the estimates of the assembly.⁴ As a remedy for their jealousy of the executive in the matter of expenditures, he suggested the insertion of a clause in their bill making the receiver general accountable to the assembly as well as to the crown, and also a clause that no warrants closure with his letter of Nov. 14, 1710. In it Morris reflected on the good faith of the assembly and on the unfair tactics which it resorted to in order to prevent a consideration of the salary question. It was doubtless this which occasioned his expulsion. Another tender spot upon which he touched was the cost of sessions of the assembly in the form of the wages of the members and the extent to which this was increased by spinning out sessions. The members from the city also were offended by the freedom with which Morris, a country member, urged a resort to indirect taxes as offering a source of revenue which would be ample for all needs.

¹ See Spencer, Phases of Royal Government in New York, 133; Smith, History of New York, I, 179 et seq.

² Ass. J. I, 284; N. Y. Docs. V, 89-90.

³ As a naturalization act was not passed at this time, Hunter thought of letters of denization, but found that in 1700 all the governors had been prohibited granting these, so he awaited further orders; N. Y. Docs. V, 211; Cal. St. P. Col., 1700, pp. 34, 38, 71, 73-74, 430.

⁴ Ibid., 185. One of the bills levying a duty on goods sold at auction, and estimated to yield £500, wrote Hunter, would not yield a farthing, and was really intended by its promoters to bring that method of sale to an end as injurious to their trade.

to the vote of salaries for governors which was prescribed in them and suggested that it was more economical than the bestowment of presents. "It is necessary at this Time that you be told also that giving Money for the Support of Government, and disposing of it at your Pleasure, is the same with giving none at all; her Majesty is the sole Judge of the Merits of her servants . . ." Whig as he was, no one ever exceeded Hunter in the emphasis which he laid on the binding force of instructions, but he was quite wrong in assuring the assembly that the queen's instruction concerning salaries met with "a cheerful and grateful Compliance in all her other Colonies."

When the house began to quibble over the question of its right legally to meet on the strength of a proclamation which had been issued from Burlington, New Jersey,¹ Hunter immediately dissolved it and ordered a new election. This was just on the eve of the arrival of Sir Hovenden Walker's expedition against Canada. Though nearly every member of the previous assembly, including Morris, was reelected,² no conflict between the houses occurred during its first session, because all were so occupied with the outfit of the troops. Bills of credit to the amount of £25,000 were issued and a levy on real and personal estates to the estimated amount of £10,000 was voted.³

But in connection with appropriations and the adjustment of accounts after the failure of that expedition, the dispute between the two houses was renewed.⁴ The usual bill for a levy on real and personal estates became law, as did an appropriation act for the repair of the forts at Albany and Schenectady and the support of garrisons there. Though the former of these gave the usual powers to the treasurer, the council let it pass. But the bills for a tonnage duty and a chimney tax it amended by leaving out the word treasurer and making the money payable to the receiver general. A message came back from the assembly that the council must

¹ See a representation of the board of trade on this subject N. Y., Docs., V, 287.

² Compare the lists, Ass. J. I, 271, 298.

³ Col. Laws, I, 730, 737.

⁴ Ass. J. I, 301 et seq.; C. J. I, 324, 328; N. Y. Docs. V, 292-299; Col. Laws I, 746, 750.

be well informed of the "undoubted right and constant resolve of this house not to admit of any amendment to money bills." In the messages which were then exchanged between the two houses the council resorted to historical argument and precedents, citing instances as late as 1703 in which its amendments to money bills had been accepted by the assembly. It also expressed the legalist and royalist view of the origin of the two houses—a view to which Cornbury had given utterance—that they were constituted "by the mere grace of the crown signified in the governor's commission." It was amply assured of the support of the board of trade and that the crown would confirm the power claimed by the council if it desired. But in its reply the assembly drew a sharp distinction between its position and that of the council.¹ It is true, it said, that the share of the council in legislation did not flow from the nature of that board—which was to advise, or "from their being another distinct State or Rank of People in the Constitution, which they are not, being all Commons, but only from the mere pleasure of the prince signified in the commission. On the contrary, the inherent Right of the Assembly to dispose of the money of the Free-men of this Colony does not come from any Commission, Letters Patent or other Grant from the Crown, but from the free Choice and Election of the People, who ought not to be divested of their Property (nor justly can) without their Consent." The acceptance of amendments in former times they termed "condescensions," not precedents. The fact that the board of trade could see no reason why the council had not the right to amend money bills was, in the opinion of the assembly, far from proving that there was such a right.

Whether this statement was drawn by William Nicoll or by other members of the assembly, it must stand as a most significant expression of the colonial spirit. It was an appeal as against concessions from the absolute and indefeasible power of government, to the principle of representation as a guaranty of property—and of course of other rights as well—against the executive. It also voiced a protest which was steadily growing in volume against the position of appointed councils as upper houses of the legislatures. But they were an essential part of the provincial system, and if they fell it would be impossible long to uphold the province or even the colonial status. It is no wonder that the issue was regarded as one of deep significance on both sides, and that they were resolved to adhere to their respective positions. The language used by Hunter in a number of his letters shows that he fully appreciated the gravity of the issue. In his speech to the assembly in April, 1711, he had said, "however your Resentment has fallen upon the Governors, it is the Government you dislike." To Secretary St. John he wrote, they "have but one short step to make towards what I am unwilling to name."¹ The bills which were involved of course failed to become law, and when a proposal came from Governor Dudley that New York should be represented in a conference of governors to deliberate on the war, both council and assembly advised Hunter not to attend because of the lack of revenue.² A bill concerning fees also failed, and this was followed by a resolution of the assembly, that the establishment of fees without its consent was contrary to law.

¹ Ass. J. I, 307.

For some time before the arrival of Hunter, New York had been without a court of chancery.³ Suits had accumulated and many petitions were now presented for the re-establishment of such a court. Hunter wrote to the board of trade and it referred him to his commission, which authorized him, with the advice of the council, to establish courts. The council then advised him that he was chancellor by virtue of his custody of the seal of the province. He therefore issued a proclamation for the opening of a court of chancery. This, too, offended the assembly, because it was done without its consent.⁴ Though the court was doubtless of utility to the people at large, its more immediate usefulness, as developed before many months, was by the issue of chancery writs to facilitate the collection of quit rents and their arrears.⁵ By this means revenue from that source, which had almost ceased, was increased to sums

¹ N. Y. Docs. V, 296.

² Ass. J. I, 308; C. J. I, 326.

³ N. Y. Docs. V, 298.

⁴ Ass. J. I, 308.

⁵ N. Y. Docs. V, 357, 361, 362, 369-370, 561; Spencer, 143.

varying from £300 to £600 per year. It was also planned, if possible, to secure an income from escheats and other regalian rights. But from these sources only slight relief could be expected and that after a considerable period.

The same question came up under another form in connection with the proposed appointment of Colonel Lodwick again as agent. The bill for this originated in the assembly and provided for a levy of money for his support and for a committee of the assembly to sit continuously to instruct and correspond with him, the governor and council to be wholly excluded from his control. Hunter stated that the interference of Lodwick in the affairs of the province had injured the interest of the crown, for letters of his to John de Peyster had been dropped in the streets and copies sent to most of the counties in order to obstruct the settling of a revenue. Naturally the bill for making him an agent under such conditions failed to receive the assent of the council, as did a similar bill the next session.¹ On all these points the governor was sure of the support of the crown.

During the spring session of 1712 the hostile relations continued, though with some lowering of intensity. Hunter was personally so agreeable that the members of the assembly professed the utmost willingness "to make him easy," as their expression was, if he would put his private interest in competition with that of the crown.² He considered that he must give up the most important part of executive authority in order to gain any support from the assembly in its existing disposition. "I have not only expended my own money for all the contingencies of the government since I have been here," he wrote, "but the daily complaints and cries of the officers, who have not received a shilling for their support since my coming, render my condition very miserable and would make it insupportable but for the relief I hope for from home." Under the colonial system of finance official salaries and other forms of support were exceedingly precarious. Governments on both sides of the ocean often failed to keep their promises, and had it not been for fees and perquisites—which by far their largest sources of income — public servants would indeed have been in a sad plight. During the present session 8025 ounces of plate were appropriated for the support of the government since June, 1710, which barely covered the salary due the governor without additional allowances.¹ Provision was also made for the payment of certain British officers and for the temporary defence of the frontier.

¹ Ass. J. I., 319 et seq.

² N. Y. Docs. V, 340.

At the opening of the session of September, 1712, Hunter submitted an elaboration of the plan he had suggested two years before, by which the responsibility of the receiver general to the governor and council might be assured and expenditures kept within appropriations, with ultimate accounting to the assembly.² This, he claimed, would remove the only material objection to what he demanded. More he could not do, if he would, for he was bound by his instructions. This plan provided that every quarter the receiver general should lay before the governor and council a statement of the money he had received, and all employees of the government and those who had rendered it services should at the same time submit their claims, which should be examined and allowed by the governor and council. Warrants should then be issued for the payment of claims, but not in excess of the amount of revenue available at the close of each quarter, claimants being allowed to bring an action of debt against the receiver general on any failure upon his part to conform to the conditions thus provided. This scheme, if honestly executed, would put all creditors of the government on an equality, would have necessitated a speeding up of the collection of revenue and would have corrected much of the looseness so prevalent in administration. For these reasons, doubtless, as well as the fact that its execution rested too much in the hands of the executive, it was not acceptable.

Though considerable legislating was done at this session, no bills were submitted for the support of the government "but such as they well knew could not pass."³ Failing to obtain an agent to their liking, the assembly addressed the queen in their own defence,¹ and asked her to order the governor to assent to an act empowering the assembly to appoint and pay an agent to present their views and answer objections. Of course no result came from this, and after a long prorogation this assembly was dissolved.²

¹ Ass. J. I, 314; Col. Laws, I, 753, 756-7; N. Y. Docs. V, 339.

² Ass. J. I, 321; C. J. I, 343.

³ N. Y. Docs. V, 350.

The sectional feeling which had long existed between the country districts and the city of New York, and which had shown itself earlier in the bolting act, had long been gaining headway again and came to full expression in the election of 1713.³ It deeply affected political issues in the time of Hunter and constituted one of the permanent features of New York history. The issue to which it specially gave rise at this time was that of indirect versus direct taxation, or customs revenue and excise on the sale of liquors as opposed to general levies on real and personal estate. The latter, which fell chiefly on land, affected the country, while the former rested upon trade. Between 1691 and 1709 appropriations of "revenue" had been made for periods varying from two to five years and, as wines, liquors and European goods were the chief objects of levy, the claim was made that it fell largely on the rich or well-to-do who were consumers of luxuries. Morris, in the pamphlet referred to, followed this line of argument and, as a leader of the country party, urged that the rich should bear the chief burden of taxation. He did not believe that the duty would be all transferred to the general body of consumers and appear in an equivalent rise of prices, neither did he think that the policy he defended would drive trade from New York.⁴ In proof of this last point he cited the example of other colonies, especially Massachusetts, Connecticut and Pennsylvania, which imposed similar duties but at the same time maintained a flourishing trade and industry. In 1709 the appropriation of "revenue" had stopped, as the result of the dispute over salaries, and it was the intense need of its restoration for

¹ Ass. J. I, 328, 329.

² N. Y. Docs. V, 356.

³ Spencer, in Pol. Sci. Quarterly, Nov. 1915. Address to the Inhabitants of Westchester County (1713), printed anonymously, but evidently the work of Lewis Morris. A copy of this is in C. O. 5/1050, Aa, 131.

⁴ William Nicoll, as we have seen, had supported the opposite contention in 1699.

purely fiscal reasons which roused the governor's supporters. To their support naturally came the country interest, the farmers and men of small property up the Hudson and on the frontier, the thinly settled and expanding sections of the province, and their vote contributed strongly not only toward restoring the "revenue" but toward adjusting the complicated financial difficulties of the time.

Long Island, and especially its eastern section, stood in a peculiar relation to this issue and to the sectional feeling which was affecting the course of New York politics. We have already seen¹ how distinct, in the make-up of its population and in its affiliations with New England, this section was from the other parts of New York. This was also reflected in its trade relations, which could be much more conveniently maintained with New England than with the City of New York. Hence the demand of Long Island for a port and the amount of illegal trade, combined with the harboring of pirates, which went on there. But the demand for a port was not granted and New York, in the enforcement of its monopoly in reference to entries and clearances, imposed hardships on the Long Islanders. An important industry in that section was the capture of drift whales. Inasmuch as revenue was now cut off and the credit of the governor was being so heavily drawn on to provide for necessary expenses, attention was directed toward the king's right to royal fish as a possible source of revenue. This bore exclusively upon the industry of the Long Islanders, while the increase of pressure which was being brought to bear to promote the collection of quit rents also affected them. This all gave rise to a violent protest from the eastern end of the island, which was voiced by Samuel Mulford, of East-hampton, as will appear in the sequel.

It is probable also that Hunter himself took a hand in the controversy by publishing an anonymous pamphlet,² in which he upheld the prerogative in the strongest terms. He accused the assembly of arrogance, equalled only by that of the Long Parliament, and declared that its policy would leave the queen with no more power in the province than that of an Indian sachem. Defending strongly the policy of imposing indirect taxes, he sarcastically described the party cries which were being hurled back and forth during the election, for it was to influence this struggle that the pamphlet was issued.

¹ Osgood, Am. Colonies in 17th Century, II, 106, 121 et seq., 133, 159 et seq.; Spencer, op. cit.

² Entitled, "To all whom these Presents May Concern," quarto, 7 pp., in C. O. 5/1050.

The warmly contested election of 1713 resulted in about half a dozen changes in the personnel of the assembly, but not enough to indicate a change in its policy.¹ Therefore Hunter met it, in May, 1713, with the expectation that its life would be short, and then would follow, as in Bello-mont's time, a wholesale removal of justices of the peace and officers of the militia, "that ill men may no longer use Her Majesty's authority against her."² In his opening speech³ he told them plainly that he could not depart from the constitution of the province as established, though he would assent to any beneficial acts which conformed with its requirements. But he urged frequent conferences between the houses, and that they should do their plain duty. He could hold over them the threat that parliament might cure their delinquency by stringent action, but with the Tories in power in England Hunter must know that he could hardly play a part in such a measure, even if it was adopted.⁴ During several of the early sessions in committee of the whole this speech was considered. Finally, resolutions were adopted to impose customs duties again for the support of the government, something which had not been done for a decade; and further, that the control over their collection and of the revenue from them should be in the hands of the receiver general.⁵ If these should not yield £2800, the balance should be made good by the treasurer out of excise. A bill for an excise on the retail of liquors for twenty years was proposed, but it was not perfected and assented to by the governor until the next session.⁶ With this was passed an

¹ Dutchess County was then separated from Ulster and given one member.

² N. Y. Docs., V, 356, 364.

³ Ass. J. I, 333.

⁴ N. Y. Docs. V, 366, 367, 377.

⁵ Ass. J. I, 336; Col. Laws I, 779.

⁶ N. Y. Docs. V, 366; Col. Laws I, 785, 789.

act laying a tax on goods sold at auction. By both these the treasurer was given control over their execution and the keeping of the revenue from them.

The measures thus far passed, with their many novel features, indicated that a spirit of compromise was active in the assembly. With this the governor and all concerned must have earnestly cooperated. In a brief speech at the opening of the spring session of 1714, the governor said that they had met to complete business left unfinished at adjournment, chiefly the payment of the public debts.¹ A sufficient fund for this had already been appropriated and the claims had been stated, and he could see no reason for deferring their payment. He would leave nothing undone to keep up a perfect understanding. The house now went into committee of the whole on this speech at nearly every session for two months, with Lewis Morris in the chair.² From the petitions and certified claims a long list of specific sums was prepared for payment. An incident of the inquiries was the arrest of Peter Fauconier for fraudulently attempting to secure certain payments on warrants which had already been paid. These sums were all embodied in the most important appropriation act up to that time passed by a New York legislature.³ It provided for paying the debts of the province to the persons named therein, it made void all other claims, and it carried with it a provision for the issue of £27,680 in bills of credit with which to make these payments. A commission was named for issuing the bills, and the revenue arising under the excise act was pledged for their redemption.⁴ The administration of the act was intrusted to the treasurer, as was the care of practically all monies raised by future acts of assembly. Thus the receiver general was kept in the inferior position to which he had been assigned by previous legislation. With this the unrestricted power of the governor to issue money under his warrant suffered a corresponding decline. Though the council amended this measure in several particulars, a conflict was avoided by the assembly declaring

¹ Ass. J. I, 345.

² Ibid., 346-360.

³ Chap. 280, Col. Laws I, 815-826.

⁴ The farming of the excise was taken out of the hands of local justices and intrusted to commissioners named in the law. Col. Laws I, 835.

that it was not a money bill.¹ In advocating its approval by the home government,² however, Hunter was careful to claim it as a money bill, stating that it was for the support of the government, though for its "past support."

Provision was made for the support of government for one year and also a tonnage duty and an import duty on slaves was imposed for two years.³ The revenue from the last mentioned act was to go into the treasurer's hands and be expended as the governor, council and assembly should direct, while that from the yearly support bill was to be paid to the receiver general — one of the few instances of this — and no directions were given as to its expenditure.

The death of the queen made a new election necessary, as a result of which several new members were chosen from the northern part of the province, but otherwise there was no change. In this assembly the system of compromises, by which a revenue for a period of years was secured and harmony restored, was completed by the passage of a naturalization act and of an act providing a revenue for five years. The former was a favorite measure with the Dutch and French of the province. It declared that all persons of foreign birth who were inhabitants of the province in 1683 and who had since died seized of lands, should hereafter be deemed to have been naturalized. It also declared naturalized all Protestants of foreign birth who were dwelling in the province in 1715. When Hunter found that one of these bills was likely to block the way of the other, he asked what the assembly would do for the government if he would pass the naturalization bill. "I asked nothing for myself, though they well knew that I had offers of several thousands of pounds for my assent." They at last agreed to settle a sufficient revenue for five years as their part of the bargain. "Many rubs I met with, but with difficulty carried it through both parts of the Legislature." "I have been struggling for bread for five years to no effect, . . . I hope I have now laid a foundation for a last settlement on this hitherto unsettled and ungovernable Province."⁴ Presently thereafter Lewis

¹ Ass. J. I, 365.

² The act was confirmed June 17, 1715. N. Y. Docs. V, 412.

³ Col. Laws I, 801, 812. ⁴ N. Y. Docs. V, 416, 419; Col. Laws I, 847, 858.

Morris was appointed chief justice, "he having by his labors and industry in the Assemblies deserved well of the Government, and to that it is in great measure we owe our present settlement." The naturalization act was criticised in England, but was not disallowed.¹ As a minor feature of the settlement, the fact also should be noted that by statute an agency to England was created. John Champante, who had long been agent for the independent companies, was named in the act and money appropriated for his support, this all being the joint action of governor, council and assembly. Ambrose Phillips succeeded to this office the following year.² In 1718 William Nicoll, who had steadily opposed Hunter, resigned the speakership, and Robert Livingston, who had long been serviceable to the governor, was chosen to the place and held it into the following administration.³

Though the act of 1715 for paying the debts of the province declared that all other claims except those for which provision was made therein should be void, it was later found that many lawful creditors, who had not been able to make the justice of their claims appear at the time, had been passed over. Therefore, at the close of 1716, another act providing for these was passed.⁴ This act called for another issue of bills of credit to the amount of 41,517½ ounces of plate, the redemption of the same to be secured by an excise on the retailing and a duty on the importing of liquors, about twenty years being allowed for the completion of this process. Like its predecessors this act also contained a detailed list of the claimants and of the sums which were due them. As all the parts of the legislature were now working harmoniously, this measure was sprung upon the commercial element in the province as a surprise. They had supposed that the debt paying process, with its imposts and issues of bills of credit, had been completed by the bill of 1715. When it was found that this was not true, a chorus of protest was raised on Long Island and in New York City. The grand jury of New York City and County, among whose members were such men as

¹ N. Y. Docs. V, 495.

² Col. Laws, I, 881, 897.

³ N. Y. Docs. V, 495.

⁴ Col. Laws, I, 938.

Stephen Van Cortlandt, Robert Lurting, Henry Lane, John Reed, George Emmot, William Smith, William Walton, merchants and lawyers, sent a protest to the governor, while the bill was pending, asking him to veto it.¹ For petitioning the governor in alleged contempt of the two houses the jurors were brought before the assembly by the sergeant at arms. Their answer was that, though their act was not a proper one, it did not amount to a contempt, and with this the action of the grand jury was allowed to drop. But against the bill, when it reached England, various representations were made by merchants engaged in the New York trade, while the governor and assembly defended it in an elaborate statement to the board of trade, and Hunter repeatedly defended it in his letters.² Morris, as chief justice and member of the assembly, was very active not only in supporting the bill but in threatening with the law those who showed any signs of sedition in opposing it. Its opponents charged the governor and legislature with bad faith in passing it, in order to secure money for themselves and provide for sham debts, which had once been rejected when the previous bill had been drafted. These charges met with strong denials and did not specially influence the British government in its attitude toward the measure. To it the questionable feature of the bill was its provision for another issue of paper and the effect which this would have on British trade. Richard West, the counsel of the board of trade, reported on it in August, 1718. About a year before the order had been issued to the governors not to assent to any acts affecting the trade of Great Britain without a suspending clause. As to the effect on debts of the issue of the bills of credit, West thought the merchants could allow for that so as to escape loss; and so the only point upon which he questioned the validity of the measure was in connection with the above order. But this was not considered by the privy council to be sufficient to justify its disallowance, and so the act was confirmed,³ May 19, 1720. But it was ordered that all the governors be instructed not to assent to acts for the issue of bills of credit without the insertion in them of a suspending clause.

¹ Ass. J. I, 411; C. O. 5/1051, Bb, 131.

² C. O. 5/1051, Bb, 131, 153, 154, 167; N. Y. Docs, V, 499, 504.

³ N. Y. Col. Docs. V, 539.

As steps leading to this settlement progressed, to the mind of Samuel Mulford his own grievances and those of the people of eastern Long Island seemed to grow in number and seriousness. In the course of enforcing the acts of trade, customs duties and port at New York, many of Mulford's neighbors lost vessels and cargoes, or parts of their goods, or were put to great expense and inconvenience in other ways. Mulford and his sons were prosecuted for failure to pay the license fees required for permission to carry on their whale fishing. They were also sued for arrears of quit rents, the elder Mulford being prosecuted in the alleged capacity of trustee for the town of Easthampton, though he declared he had not held that office during the last ten years. These suits cost him much time and expense and many long journeys in attending court. He was a member of the assembly and had been so for about ten years. He was now about seventy years of age, a born fighter whose stubborn independence had not been diminished by his years. During the session of 1714 his patience gave way and in a long, repetitious and passionate speech he denounced the government of New York and hurled his defiance at it. The executive, he declared, controlled everything, their past reforms availed nothing, the assembly was forced to follow the lead of the executive and liberty was dead. He later published this speech and its implications, as Hunter interpreted it, were that the dishonesty of previous administrations was being repeated in his own.¹ He therefore submitted the charges to the council and assembly and Mulford was expelled from the house.

Mulford thereupon went to England to lay his grievances before the board of trade and privy council and demand redress.² There his charges broadened out into the general claim that in the assembly of New York the remoter country districts of the north were over represented. Long Island in particular had been discriminated against in the distribution of seats. The salaries which were paid to the Indian commissioners, the land grants which were made to them, and the presents which were annually distributed among the tribesmen were all brought into alignment with this policy and the conclusion was drawn that the colony was being made tributary to the heathen. Upon this subject Mulford talked much while he was in the assembly and was charged with promoting the scheme of a wholesale destruction of the Indians. The peril involved in this led the assembly, in 1717, to send an address of protest to the governor.¹ In reference to Mulford's charge that the sections were unequally represented, to an extent it was of course true in all the provinces, for the system required that the counties should elect a uniform number of representatives, usually two each. These counties which contained cities, boroughs or manors received additional representation for these jurisdictions. In this arrangement, which was a reproduction of the British system, some regard was had to differences of population, and when additions were made to the number of the assembly the new members came from those parts of the province the population of which was increasing. In the case of New York during the first half of the eighteenth century, it was the region of the upper Hudson and Mohawk rivers, while the rate of increase in New York City and Long Island was less than that of the province as a whole.² Mulford's claim, moreover, that in making up quotas of direct taxes advantage was taken of the inferior number of representatives from Long Island in order to impose undue burdens on that section could not be substantiated. The council and assembly, in answering this and other charges which he had made in England,³ declared that in making up quotas taxable wealth as well as population was considered. As a general statement this doubtless was true, though local cabals and the general tendency of rural communities to transfer the burden of taxation to commercial centres, were also in operation.

¹ A copy of this and of other Mulford material is in C. O. 5/1051. Hunter's arguments against Mulford and his sarcastic references to him are in his letters, N. Y. Col. Docs. V, 474, 480, 498, 501, 505, 510. The arguments used before the supreme court in the case involving the royal rights to whales are in C. O. 5/1050, Aa, 136.

² "A Memorial of Several Aggrievances and Oppressions, etc.," also "An Information," in which he attacked the courts and explained his claims in connection with the whaling industry. These are printed in Doc. Hist. of N. Y., III, 363.

¹ Ass. J. I, 403.

² Spencer, op. cit.

³ C. O. 5/1051, Bb, 148.

That Mulford and his friends had suffered from the crude and arbitrary methods of government then and always in vogue, there can be no doubt. But his voice was like that of one crying in the wilderness and the reputation which he doubtless gained was that of a troublesome, though no un-amiable, fanatic. He added one more to the perplexities with which Hunter had to contend. Nicholson, who now bore the added title of general, had been in the colonies for several years, originally under a roving commission from Anne to inquire into their finances et cetera. About the results of this errand it is impossible to gain any definite information, except that the churchmen availed themselves of it to boost both Nicholson and their own cause. The churchmen, as we know, were very bitter against Hunter and doubtless looked back with regret to Cornbury and forward with hope to a time when Nicholson should succeed Hunter. This probably would have come about, had it not been for the opportune death of Anne. It was the return of the Whigs to power on the accession of the Hanoverians which prolonged Hunter's administration until he was able to adjust affairs upon a more tolerable basis in his two provinces. Meantime, even while the elements of opposition were so many and his financial condition so hopeless that he said he expected to die in a jail, Hunter, as we have seen, kept up his spirits by composing, with the aid of Morris, his farce called "Androborus, The Man Eater."¹ In this a diverting picture was drawn of the assembly, with its mixed Dutch and English membership, its intrigues and absurdities. The leading political figures of the province, with Nicholson at their head and Vesey in a prominent place, were introduced under fictitious names and by this means the governor was able to pillory his enemies. "The laugh was turned upon them in all companies," says Colden, "and from this laughing humour the people began to be in good humour with their Governor and to despise the idol of the clergy."

In New Jersey the accession of Lovelace, who was a man of integrity, would have ultimately meant the overthrow of the clique which still controlled the council. But his untimely death prevented the consummation of that result. While he was in office, however, a new assembly, with Thomas Gordon as speaker of the lower house, appropriated a very moderate revenue for one year, reduced the severity of the penalties in the militia law, and passed several other important bills. The issues between the warring factions were also again aired. At the request of the lower house, the governor laid before it a copy of the address sent to the queen in 1707 by Ingoldsby, Quarry, Coxe and their friends in the council, in which the chief responsibility for the very offensive conduct of the late house was cast on Morris and Jennings.¹ The house asked that the council should appear before the governor to make good its charges, and that the house itself might be present. On the signers of the address desiring more time in which to collect evidence in support of their charges, Chief Justice Mompesson, one of the signers, admitted that he had put his name to the paper without examining its contents, as was often done in such cases,² but signed the later and more detailed set of charges which was submitted by the anti-proprietary group.³ In this, beginning with Gordon's sharp practice in the East Jersey election of 1703, they traced with great bitterness and violence of language the conduct of the proprietary opposition throughout Cornbury's administration. Though Jennings was now dead, he came in for strong criticism as to his conduct while reading the remonstrance before Cornbury and on other occasions; but the arraignment of Morris and Willocks was prolonged and extremely violent. In view of Morris' career as a whole, it is impossible to doubt the truth of much that was here stated about him, and it all throws a sinister light on the political tactics then in vogue in some of the colonies and on the extent to which they were allowed to pervert private relations as well.

¹ Colden, op. cit., 202. One printed copy of this is known to exist.

The lower house, in addition to sending its answer to the charges of the council to the queen, attacked Peter Sonmans in matters affecting not only his gross violations of private morals, but his oppressive conduct as councillor and justice of the peace on several occasions.⁴ To this he presented a long reply to the governor and no prosecution followed at that

¹ N. J. Arch. II, 364 et seq.

² Ibid., 390-415.

³ Ibid., 374.

⁴ N. J. Arch. III, 385, 394, 416-460; Tanner, 399.

time. Fauconier, however, was removed from the office of receiver general, he failing to submit vouchers for his accounts of the last revenue. Miles Forster, a proprietor, was appointed as receiver general and treasurer in his place. In fact, the death of Lovelace saved the anti-proprietors from overthrow at that time, for Ingoldsby, though an order in council for the recall of his commission as lieutenant governor in both provinces had been issued in 1706, the warrant for which had not been signed and sent, now assumed the office in New Jersey and held it until the arrival of Governor Hunter.¹ The order finally revoking his commission was not signed at Windsor until October, 1709. Ingoldsby supported the Coxe faction, as Cornbury had done, and helped to perpetuate its hold on the council.

The important event of Ingoldsby's brief administration was the Nicholson-Vetch expedition against Canada. While this diverted attention to an extent from domestic politics, the two inevitably interacted with a result which further illustrated the situation in New Jersey.² The council, of course, was favorable in every way to the orders of the queen and the program of her agents. But the assembly, with its Quaker membership, was opposed to the raising of a quota by a draft, and insisted that only volunteers should be called out. By sharp tactics on both sides a bill, intended to appropriate £3000 for the expedition, was defeated. The house also defeated a bill from the council for preventing persons leaving the province to escape service on the expedition. After some further bickerings Ingoldsby adjourned the assembly for more than a month, and then he and his supporters in the council prepared an address to the queen, in which they charged the Quakers with responsibility for the delinquency of the province and urged that they be excluded from office. But on the solicitation of Nicholson and Vetch, the assembly was called together again after a recess of ten days and promptly passed bills for encouraging volunteers, raising £3000 and issuing £3000 in bills of credit. These were all agreed to by the council, though not without some futile attempts at amendment. After the expedition, a new assembly having been elected, a controversy arose over the accounts of the expenditures and the issues of currency which were occasioned thereby. Some petty irregularities were brought to light, which furnished occasion for nothing except more party recrimination.

¹ N. J. Arch. III, 460, 469, 475.

² Ibid., XIII, 329 et seq.; Tanner, 401.

At the time of the accession of Hunter to the governorship the council of East Jersey proprietors had been virtually dissolved; their records and the management of their affairs were in the hands of Sonmans. Little revenue from quit rents had been raised and such as there was had come into his hands. The old opposition in Elizabethtown and Monmouth still existed and supported Sonmans and Coxe in order to escape quit rents. From Monmouth came at this time the most active opponents of the proprietors — the Bownes, Salter, the Lawrences and Gershom Mott. Hunter's advice, given in his first speech to the council,¹ was that they should leave disputes about property to the courts and join in efforts for the public welfare. But the dispute had been too long and bitter for this and the courts were not to be trusted. There were bills which by his instructions should be enacted, and harmony was the condition necessary for this.

The assembly proceeded actively with legislation, in part on lines suggested by the governor, until it had perfected nineteen measures. They included a bill regulating elections, which was required by Hunter's instructions, a bill relieving those injured by the militia act, and a bill so regulating the qualifications of jurors that Quakers might serve.² When these and the other measures came before the council, they rejected all but five,³ defeating them in some cases on the second reading and in others so clogging them with amendments as to necessitate their rejection. Only three important bills were saved — the act of support, that amending the act for the currency of bills of credit and the measure, reviving the militia act.

In the course of proceedings over these bills, the house through a committee tried to get access to the council minutes to see what action had been taken. Being unable to secure a copy from Basse, the secretary, they applied to the governor and he procured the favor which they desired. The house then desired to see the papers which related to the Canada expedition and for a time was thwarted in this by Basse and the council, though finally the request was granted. A special application, however, had to be made to Hunter before the assembly secured proof of the reasons which led Lawrence and Mott to vote against the appropriation for the expedition. They were then censured and Mott was finally expelled. William Sanford was also expelled, because he had signed the address sent by Ingoldsby and the council to the queen in Cornbury's time. They then sent to the governor an answer to these charges and an able arraignment of the abuses of Cornbury's time and later.¹ Charges were then made against Hall and Basse for numerous illegal acts,² the one as a judge and the other as secretary. Sonmans and Pinhorne were also involved. The courts and general administration were shown to be corrupt and arbitrary, and the two houses had become as hostile toward one another as ever.

¹ N. J. Arch. XIII, 427; Tanner, 625.

² N. J. Arch. IV, 19 et seq.

³ Ibid., 51 et seq.; Arch. XIII, 434 et seq.

Hunter, however, had by these means learned what the situation was and had naturally made up his mind that the proprietary party represented the true sentiments of the province. As soon as the session closed, he wrote a full account of affairs to the board of trade and insisted that Pinhorne, Sonmans, Coxe and Hall be removed from the council. An understanding was also reached that no further serious attempt at legislation should be made until such action had been taken in England, and the West Jersey Society supported his demands. In August, 1712, the board of trade, under suggestions from Paul Dominique and his party among the proprietors, recommended their removal and the appointment of Anderson, William Morris, John Hamilton and Reading in their places. Elisha Parker and Thomas Byerly were recommended for vacancies.³ Though opposition was made by Dockwra in England and by the Anglican clergy in the province, action in accordance with the desires of Hunter was taken. Jameson and Farmar succeeded Mompesson and Pinhorne as justices of the supreme court.

¹ N. J. Arch. IV, 24.

² Ibid., 71, 79 et seq.

³ Ibid., IV, 115, 140, 152, 168-171, 182. William Morris died before his appointment was made.

Being now secure of a proprietary majority in both houses, the governor met the assembly again in December, 1713.¹ Harmony was the keynote, both in the governor's speech and in the reply. The coming of peace in Europe and America was not unfavorable to this feeling. An unusually long session was held, continuing until March seventeenth. More than thirty bills were passed, many being of importance, and in all the business of the session good feeling prevailed. It was shown in many successful conferences. One of the bills most needed was that which should sanction, once for all, the affirmation of the Quakers and thus guarantee to them the exercise of political rights beyond dispute. "Our men of voice," wrote Hunter, "exerted their talent against it, but in vain." Another measure to prevent malicious informations had also been a subject of earlier conflict. Another useful statute was the one regulating the practice of the law and lowering the cost of litigation.² An act confirming conveyances of land was passed, but a bill confirming the rights of the proprietors of West Jersey came too late in the session to receive the governor's assent. There was a general inspection of accounts by the assembly and appropriations for the support of government and the payment of claims in arrear were amicably made, £500 a year and £100 for expenses being fixed as the governor's share. Hunter had kept himself in the background throughout the session and no evidence appears in the journal of the assembly that he interfered with its proceedings.

But the death of the queen and the accession of George I, necessitating also the issue of a new commission to Hunter, brought this assembly to an end. In connection with the new election and even with the issue of a new commission Hunter's enemies had another opportunity to attack him and oppose his policy. In England Dr. Daniel Coxe and the earl of Clarendon opposed the reappointment of Hunter, but in vain.³ In the province the opposition, led by Coxe and Basse and supported by Talbot and other high churchmen, revived, especially in the western division, and a majority against Hunter was returned. The new assembly was called to meet at Amboy¹ and Coxe was chosen speaker. The governor, in his opening speech, referred to the charges made by Dr. Daniel Coxe and his son in England and that they pretended to have been instructed from this side. The governor bade defiance to the most malicious, conscious as he was that he had always acted for the public welfare. He reminded the assembly of the need of support for the government, but apart from that, so much good legislation had been passed at the last session that the present sitting of the assembly might be short.

¹ N. J. Arch. XIII, 484 et seq.; IV, 195 et seq.; Tanner, 420.

² See Arch. IV, 196.

³ N. J. Arch. IV, 199, 202, 203.

But a controversy was at once begun by the opposition over the right of the governor to call the assembly at Amboy. It requested to be removed to Burlington, on the plea that by one of the acts of Ingoldsby's administration, which had been confirmed by the crown, all sessions should be held there. But the instructions, in harmony with the arrangement made after the surrender, provided that sessions should be held alternately at Amboy and Burlington, and Hunter took the ground that the power to call sessions was a part of the power of the crown. The action of the late queen in approving the law, he contended, would have to be confirmed by the new king. After some sparring between the house and the governor, he prorogued it for about a month. When the time came for resuming the session, Coxe and several of his friends stayed away, so that a quorum could not be obtained. Warrants were sent to several of the absentees and in this way a majority was obtained. These met and elected John Kinsey speaker, and organized the house under the control of Hunter's supporters. It voted that Coxe's absence was a breach of trust and expelled him. The absentees were specially summoned, and Lawrence was arrested and forced to acknowledge his guilt. Seven others were expelled for ignoring the governor's warrants. To fill these vacancies new elections were ordered and those who had been expelled were declared incapable of sitting. By this strenuous action a house wholly agreeable to Hunter and the proprietary party was secured, and it continued in existence during the remaining five years of his term. The course of legislation and government thenceforth proceeded smoothly till the close of Hunter's administration. The Cornbury clique had been effectually defeated.

¹ N. J. Arch., XIV, 7 et seq.

Ecclesiastical ambitions and jealousies were even more closely interwoven with this struggle in New Jersey than they were in New York. As is shown in another connection, the plans of Coxe, Talbot and their associates for a colonial bishop centered about Burlington. For that reason, and taking advantage of a certain sectional spirit which survived long after East and West Jersey were combined into one province, the Coxe faction tried to make Burlington the sole meeting place of the assembly. Hunter, as a Whig and a secularist, was opposed to these strivings, and the accession of his party to power in England soon proved as well a death blow to Coxe and the Burlington clique in New Jersey. The right of Perth Amboy, as settled after the surrender, to share equally in advantages which came with sessions of the assembly was firmly established and the balance was maintained between the two sections of the province. The way toward more peaceful relations for the Quakers was also opened by the defeat of the extreme Anglican faction in the province. In 1717 the act of 1709 by which the attempt had been made to make Burlington the exclusive meeting place of the assembly was repealed and the repeal was duly confirmed in England. In 1713, as we have seen, an act was passed not only allowing Quakers to affirm but enabling them also to serve as jurors. The board of trade allowed this to lie by probationary for four years when, hearing no complaint, it was confirmed. At this juncture a number of the old opponents of Hunter petitioned the king in council for the repeal of the act, because it was repugnant to an English law of 7 and 8 Wm. III, continued by later acts, which excluded Quakers from jury service. Of this petition no effective notice was taken.¹

¹ N. J. Arch. IV, 292, 341, 366; Tanner, op. cit., 592.

CHAPTER XX

MASSACHUSETTS AND NEW ENGLAND DURING THE ADMINISTRATION OF JOSEPH DUDLEY, 1702-1715

A DECADE had passed since the issue of the second Massachusetts charter, and yet with the exception of the disallowance of a number of her acts she had been practically self-governing. This result had been effected by the appointment of Massachusetts men as governor and lieutenant governor and by the fact that Lord Bellomont's connection with New England had been little more than nominal. With the appointment of Joseph Dudley, in 1702, another New England man had been selected for the governorship. But he was a man of a different type from Phips and in a more influential position than Stoughton, and with him royal administration in the full sense of the word began. For the first time Massachusetts was brought to feel the extent of the change which had been made in her condition by the issue of the new charter, the effect of having a genuine royal executive in her midst, one who understood and sympathized with the imperial policy of the time and was prepared to test its possibilities.

Since his failure to secure the appointment on the death of Phips, Dudley had been slowly but steadily strengthening his influence and preparing for eventualities. His correspondence with Lord Cutts and other friends in England show that he was a faithful adherent, where his interests were enlisted, and that he was not without social attractiveness. His letters during the same period to his wife and son reveal the fact that the resources upon which he was living were narrow, though he was able to educate two of his children in England, and that he longed to return to his family and to the only country which he could call his home.¹ He was living during a period of change both in England and New England and his career thus far, notwithstanding the offices he had held, had been to a large extent that of an adventurer. The same had been true of many of the leading statesmen of England, emphatically so of the man who was now being launched on the career which was to make him Duke of Marlborough. Cutts and Dudley worked for years in support of their mutual interests. In 1701 Dudley was elected to parliament. There his acquaintanceship broadened and men became aware of his wide knowledge of colonial affairs. To the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel he contributed a paper on the state of religion in the English plantations in North America, and later was admitted as one of the lay members of the Society. He identified himself with the English Church, as he did with the men who seemed likely to succeed in politics, though not to an extent which would make it necessary for him to break wholly with Congregationalism, when he should return to New England. Through John Chamberlain and Richard Steele he maintained a certain connection with the literary world in London. Godfrey Dellius, the Dutch minister of Albany whom Bellomont had driven into exile, found a sympathizer in Dudley and gave him ardent support. Constantine Phips was won over to Dudley, though Sir Henry Ashurst, the other agent of Massachusetts, remained his tireless enemy and "spent many days" in efforts to prevent his appointment as governor. Even the Mathers were placated for a time, though by what means is not clear.¹ It was a selfish and scheming age and Dudley played his game well, developing by prolonged experience a natural capacity as a politician which was of no mean order. After Bellomont's death it was the desire of the old-line conservatives in Massachusetts that Wait Winthrop should be appointed lieutenant governor, and with that in view it was arranged that he should go as agent to England. But the news that Dudley was to be appointed reached Ashurst before that plan could be executed. It was a few months after Randolph, supported by Dudley, had tried to secure the passage of the first bill for the recall of all the proprietary charters. Ashurst had fought this with all his might. On July 10, 1701, Ashurst wrote to the Winthrops, that on the day before he had appeared against Dudley before the lords justices, in whose hands lay the question of his appointment as governor. "I was not allowed to have counsel," he writes, "but I got all the records and papers I could get and the best counsell I could get. I was three hours debating the cause of New England. I produced the records about Leisler's business, when I heard his friends and he denyed hee had anything to doe in that trial, . . . Hee put in a memoriall in which he denyed his share of Leisler. . . . He also produced a leter from yor Speaker that said that I was dismissed from my agency two years agoe, . . . and that the cause of my prosecuting him was because I was turned out of my agency." Lord Cutts appeared for Dudley and an address, signed by "young Pateridge & Mr. Richards" and many others, was produced desiring that Dudley might be speedily sent to Massachusetts. Blathwayt appears dimly in the background, pulling the wires for Dudley, while the recent appointments of Atwood and Byfield to judicial positions in the colonies were rightly regarded as opposed to the traditional interests of New England. "Honest Mr. Mason" was among the few who appeared with Ashurst. "If I stop him now, I hope it will be for ever." But the general court and people of Massachusetts sent no protest, and Ashurst was beaten from the start. Before his plans could be well launched,¹ Dudley secured the appointment. He had developed an interest with so many politicians that the death of William III and the succession of Anne did not affect his appointment. Thomas Povey, captain of the queen's foot guards, received the office of lieutenant governor.

¹ 2 Proc. Mass. Hist. Soc. II, 177 et seq.; 6 Mass. Hist. Soc. Colls. III, 513 et seq.

¹ Kimball, op. cit. 74. In 6 Mass. Hist. Colls. III, 501, is a letter from Dudley to Cotton Mather in 1689, in which Dudley tries to show that in Andros' council he had always worked for the liberties of New England.

Dudley was assigned solely to the government of Massachusetts and New Hampshire. The ambitious plan of colonial union which had appeared for a brief time above the horizon with the appointment of Bellomont now sank finally out of sight and New York, in its relations with New England, lapsed back into its natural status, which very much resembled that of a foreign community. The people of New England might well be thankful that they were not handed over to the tender mercies of Cornbury and his crew, or even submitted to such measures of reform as Hunter advocated. But they knew so little about these that they were unable, even by way of comparison, to make use of them as a source of comfort amid their own more or less fancied tribulations. It would have been a wholesome lesson for the extreme critics of Dudley's administration to have known what was going on in New York at that time, but so narrow and sectional were they and so possessed by the spirit of ancestor worship that they could approve only that which was framed after the meagre pattern of the first generation of New England settlers.

¹ Hutchinson, II, 120; Winthrop Papers, 6 Mass. Hist. Colls. V, 88-92; ibid., III, 86.

Dudley was appointed when the tide of imperialism, which had begun to flow under the Stuarts, was at the later flood. Apparently it had not begun to recede and it might still reach such a height that it would sweep away all chartered liberties. In the first destructive onslaught under Charles and James, Dudley had shared, though he had claimed that his part had really been that of a mediator. That aspect of the case his contemporaries, outside of the narrow official circle, were unable to perceive and ever after, among them, he incurred the reputation of a time server, an intriguer or even a traitor. Had he not been a New England man, such charges could never have been made, for so far as he was able he lived up to the instructions he received from the crown and was true to the colonial policy which at the time it was trying to carry into execution. He received the elaborate instructions which were given to all governors, and of special importance for Massachusetts were the requirements that a permanent fort should be built at Pemaquid, that a fixed and adequate salary should be granted to the governor, and that all money should be issued from the treasury by warrant under the governor's hand and with the advice of the council. Dudley was as conversant as a man of colonial birth well could be with the spirit and methods of British administration. He knew the law and he was skilled in the art of administration, with its combination of persuasion, influence exerted through patronage, and imperious command. He was the first royal governor who took up in Massachusetts, with seriousness, intelligence and during a prolonged period, the problems of administration in the way in which they were conceived by those who were most responsible for the conduct of the government both in Great Britain and the colonies. That he measured up well to the requirements of such a position, and that in one of the most important colonies and one of the most difficult to govern, his record amply proves. One might personally like or dislike him, as they did Hunter, Spotswood or Lewis Morris, but no one in his time could deny that a man of varied gifts and resources was occupying the governor's chair. The correspondence which he left is not so voluminous as that of some, but it is clear and, though in some respects intensely partisan, there is no mistaking its intent. His speeches to the general court were models of direct and forcible statements. The policy which he advocated was in general statesmanlike and such as commended itself to the best minds who were concerned with the affairs of the imperial executive. The fact, too, that Dudley was a New England man was stamped upon every feature of his administration, relieving him from the necessity of learning the character of his people at the outset and enabling him to combine tact with initiative and efficiency in most that he did. Dudley was still unavoidably a mediator between the old and the new in New England.

The most immediate and pressing need of the time was that of an adequate defence of the frontier. The conduct of the war in Massachusetts has already been described, and in reference to it all are agreed that, with the exception of the fiasco of 1707, Dudley used the means and methods which were available with judgment and vigor. For that failure he was only remotely and indirectly responsible. For the later failures, the responsibility for which rested wholly on the British government, or those whom it put in command, no colonial official was to blame. The policy which he advocated concerning Pemaquid was wise and statesmanlike, and it was not his fault that it was not adopted. The raids which were organized by Dudley contributed to the wearing down process, and that, under the circumstances, was the only effective way of bringing Indian and French outrages on the New England frontier to an end. It was doubtless the general satisfaction with Dudley's conduct of the war and the confidence which his leadership in that inspired that enabled him to avoid serious conflicts with the assembly. His administration, on the whole, was a quiet one, and did not compare in point of factional conflicts with those of many royal governors. This, of itself, affords sufficient proof of the governor's ability and his general success. No one, moreover, can deny the wisdom from the military standpoint of the effort, with which he was concerned, to bring the militia of New England, so far as possible, under a single command. But, as things were, that was impossible and Dudley only shared in a defeat which was common to all who participated in the effort.

It was on the eve of the declaration of war between England and France that Dudley was installed as governor and first met the general court. As when, more than fifteen years before, he had made his notable speech as president of the Dominion of New England, so now he addressed himself directly to imperial interests. They stood on the eve of a war, he said, the object of which was to maintain the balance of Europe and check the "exorbitant growing power of France."¹ As under Elizabeth England saw the Spanish forced to abandon the hope of universal monarchy, so under Anne might they also see the defeat of the unjust endeavors of the French king. With slight regard for the peculiar pride of New England, but with strict adherence to the truth, as imperialists and mercantilists saw it, he told them that they were not so immediately profitable to the crown as were the southern and island colonies. They were, therefore, expected to promote in all ways the production of naval stores, which were much needed at this crisis, and make these their staple commodity. They must also provide a ready supply of men and money for defence against the French; and it was in this connection that he began to urge the rebuilding of the fort at Pemaquid. He closed with an appeal for a fixed salary for the governor, lieutenant governor, secretary, judges and other officers, reminding Massachusetts with truth and yet with some exaggeration, that she lagged behind the other provinces in this matter.

¹ Journal of the Upper House, June 16, 1702.

It was only in the case of a part of the colonies that the salary of their governors was paid wholly or in part with the help of frequent appropriations by assemblies. In the case of the larger island colonies provision was made for this out of the permanent revenue of the colonies themselves, the 4½ per cent export duty on sugar in Barbadoes and the Leeward Islands, tavern licences and an impost on liquors in Jamaica, export duties on tobacco in Virginia and Maryland with some additional levies on the first mentioned province.¹ The expenditure for the governor's salary was a part of the establishment of the provinces in question, though its political importance was much greater than the salaries of minor officials or expenditures for defence which might be included. In New York, New Jersey, New Hampshire and Massachusetts, a permanent revenue had not been secured and the governors were provided for by annual grants from the legislatures, very moderate in amount. In New York it had been £600 sterling per annum, which was pronounced by the board of trade "no ways sufficient." With the establishment of the board of trade it became the purpose of the British government to secure a permanent and adequate revenue in all the royal provinces. As the New England colonies, prior to 1690, had developed but the rudiments of a salary system and were accustomed only to annual appropriations,² it was natural that Massachusetts should be most reluctant to adopt this system and that a prolonged and violent controversy might arise there over the salary question. That proved to be the case, though in New York the struggle developed more rapidly than it did in Massachusetts. It was in those two provinces that the conflict over this question became most bitter.

Toward the close of Phips' administration an act had been passed appropriating £500 "for his service and expense since his arrival."³ This was in harmony with Massachusetts custom and was to be in vogue in the other New England colonies for a long time to come. It was the equivalent of

¹ Blathwayt's Journal, Jan. 31, 1704/5 and other entries. Beer, Old Colonial System, I, 203-223; Acts P. C. Col. I, 847; II, 427-432.

² Osgood, Am. Colonies in the 17th Century, I, 483 et seq.

³ Mass. Acts and Res. I, 109, 787; Palfrey, IV, 141.

the system of presents in the other colonies, against which the crown in its instructions to the governors had set its face. Phips made a faint protest against both the form and the amount of these appropriations, but no notice was taken of it. Annual grants of £500 continued through his administration.¹ In 1699 and again in 1700 the sum of £1000, in Massachusetts currency, was granted to the earl of Bellomont, though without the express statement that this was his annual salary.² The earl resolved never to ask them for anything, though he repeatedly complained that he was their yearly pensioner, that no provision was made for a governor's house and that his support was so narrow that he could not live upon it.³ Thus the situation was brought to the attention of the British authorities and this, in connection with similar complaints from other colonies, led to the framing of the royal instruction and the opening of the long campaign for adequate and fixed salaries. In 1703 the board of trade reported to the queen that a letter should be written to Massachusetts that, in consideration of its great privileges, a suitable allowance should be settled on the governor without limitation of time, or else effective remedies would be sought. It was also advised that similar letters, though without the threat, should be sent to New Hampshire and New Jersey, and that £600 be added to the salary of the governor of New York out of the royal revenue there. Governors should also be forbidden to receive presents from the assemblies. This report was accepted and royal letters enforcing these commands were sent to all the provinces concerned.⁴

Dudley was expressly instructed to urge the establishment of permanent and adequate salaries for the governor, lieutenant governor and judges and the building of a house for the governor. The first response of the assembly to these demands, when presented by Dudley, was a temporary appropriation of £500 to the governor, the sum which had been annually granted to Phips. The assembly also declared that

¹ Acts and Res. I, 174, 188.

² Ibid., 395, 437.

³ Reports of B. T. to earl of Jersey on salaries, June 12 and 22, 1700; Bellomont to B. T., July 15, 1700; Palfrey, IV, 177.

⁴ Journal and Entry Book, B. T. Plants. Gen.; Acts P. C. Col. II, 431; N. Y. Col. Docs. IV, 1040.

the settling of salaries upon royal appointees was new to it and that it could not be thought agreeable to the existing constitution of the province. The present was accepted. Proceeding at once to the eastern parts in order to inspect the defences along the coast as far as Pemaquid, Dudley met the assembly of New Hampshire. It passed three acts for the support of the government and the prosecution of the war — one imposing a land tax, another an export duty on lumber, and a third a powder duty to keep up the fort at the entrance of the Piscataqua. Dudley was much impressed with the liberality of so small and poor a province, and from this appropriation hoped to secure £250 as his salary.¹

When the governor met the general court at Boston in the fall he renewed his demand, reminding them, with a reference to the low salaries of the judges, that if they hoped to have a government they must support it. The house replied through a committee that, considering the circumstances of the province, it was "not convenient to state salaries, but to allow as the Great and General Court shall from time to time see necessary." The council sent this resolve back for reconsideration, and the house thereupon resolved to add £100 to the amount previously granted to the governor. To this the council replied that it was not "a suitable maintenance for his Excellency," but the house refused to reconsider its vote. Then Dudley called the representatives into the council chamber and read them his instructions respecting salaries, but they remained obdurate and the sum that was offered was finally accepted.

In September, 1703, Dudley read to the court the letter from the queen to which reference was made above. The project of rebuilding Pemaquid was now being actively discussed and the representatives had sent an address to the queen in reference to this subject without consulting the council. A dispute thereupon arose between the houses over a claim of the council to inspect the journals of the lower house. It was also thought that the governor was using considerable discretion in the expenditure of the public funds. These circumstances, together with the demands of the governor, led the representatives, in November, to a formal statement of policy. "As it is the undoubted privilege of the English nation," said they, "to raise any sum or sums of money when and to dispose of them how they see cause, and so hath been from Henry III and confirmed by Edward I and ever since continued as the unquestioned right of the subject; so we hope and expect ever to enjoy the same under our most gracious Queen Anne and her successors and therefore do account it inconsistent with her Majesty's interest here, and that it may prove prejudicial to her Majesty's subjects in this province, to state perpetual salaries." According to this interpretation English history would be a very simple tale and its existing practice such as would cripple any executive and end in the concentration of all the powers of government in the hands of a legislative assembly and those to whom it chose to intrust the execution of its commands. The binding power of royal instructions upon colonial assemblies and the claim that these orders were to be regarded as law for the colonists were also brought squarely into question by the policy, and it was one to which Massachusetts continued to adhere. The issue was not so sharply drawn in the other provinces, but the attitude of most of them very much resembled that of the Puritan colony. At the close of this session Dudley wrote to the earl of Nottingham, that the people of Massachusetts loved not the crown and government of England and were ready to put slights upon it.¹

¹ C. O. 5/910; E. B. N. Eng., Dudley to B. T., Nov. 11, 1702.

At the election, in May, 1703, Dudley began the vetoing of the choice of councillors. He told the house that some men of "good ability" had been left out and others of "little or mean estate" had been chosen. Therefore he expunged five of the names in the list, among them being those of Elisha Cooke and Thomas Oakes, who were determined supporters of the principles which had obtained under the first charter.² Five others were chosen in their places and approved. At the election of the following May two of the rejected ones, Elisha Cooke and Peter Sargent, the latter a kinsman of Ashurst and with Cooke an opponent of Dudley's policy, were again returned and through its speaker the house asked the governor to accept them; but he curtly refused and "dismissed the house to their business." This time there was a delay of two weeks before the vacancies were filled. Still again, in 1706, Elisha Cooke was returned and a third time this choice, as well as that of another candidate, was vetoed.¹ In 1708 also two councillors were rejected and their places were filled by the assembly.² In general the council was submissive to the lead of the governor and no further eliminations were needed. The personal dislike which Dudley had toward Cooke and Oakes, in 1705 led to the exercise by the governor of the power granted to him in the charter of vetoing the choice of speaker by the representatives. The house made the weak plea that the exclusive right of choosing their speaker was secured by the law which provided that it should be sole judge of the elections of its members. Both houses also voted that by the charter the governor did not have the power which he claimed, the language of the instrument, however, being most explicit to the contrary. As the war and public business were pressing, Dudley wished to avoid delay and therefore finally accepted Oakes, along with the full list of councillors. The board of trade later assured Dudley of its approval of his assertion of this right and thought that it was not proper that it should be given up.³

¹ C. O. 5/898; Palfrey, IV, 290.

² Journal of the Upper House, May 27, 1703.

In the management of the war and of negotiation with the Indians and by virtue of the authority which he had to issue money from the treasury under his warrant, Dudley sometimes exercised discretion in ordering expenditures which had not been fully or expressly authorized by law or order of the general court. In this he had at least the nominal advice of the council. Upon this point the court repeatedly showed its sensitiveness and made various declarations upon the subject. Finally, in November, 1704,⁴ £50 was in this way paid to Povey, the lieutenant governor, for his services as commander of the Castle. This the house asserted to be an arbitrary act and a violation of English liberties and insisted that the sum be returned to the treasury. The council in reply called attention to an act in Bellomont's time by which the estab-

¹ Palfrey, IV, 291, 299.

² B. T. N. Eng. O. P. C. O. 5/865, Dudley to Board, July 10, 1708.

³ C. O. 5/912; E. B. N. Eng. Board to Dudley, Feb. 4, 1705/6.

⁴ Journal of the Upper House, Nov. 10.

lishment of the Castle was fixed, to the power given the governor by charter to order expenditure by warrant, and to the provision of the act granting a duty on wines and other imposts, that the revenues from it should be used for subsisting and paying the wages of soldiers in service at the Castle and forts within the province. The resolve of the house was therefore pronounced not only an unjust reflection on the governor and council, but in itself a nullity and of no force. In 1708 the representatives again complained of a number of small sums expended by the governor and council which they considered had not been authorized either expressly or under the head of contingent expenses. The council was able to show that they either were expenses contingent to the general duties of defence, or were petty expenditures on ceremonial occasions and so unworthy of notice.¹ With this the parsimonious legislators seem to have been satisfied, and it is safe to say that in the matter of public expenditures the honesty of Dudley's administration was in strongest contrast to the irregularities which were disgracing Cornbury at this time in New York.

During the closing months of 1704 and in 1705 the questions of the rebuilding the fort at Pemaquid and the granting of permanent salaries were most pointedly discussed. With these the claim was also urged, at the instance of New Hampshire, that Massachusetts should contribute toward the maintenance of the fort at the mouth of the Piscataqua. The council now supported Dudley in asking that a just and honorable support be given him. The house, on its part, had offended the governor by quietly sending an address of its own to the queen against the rebuilding of Pemaquid. They were also frequently asking the crown to send over supplies and munitions of war. Dudley now received a letter from the board of trade informing him of these things and declaring it unreasonable that the assembly should expect to be furnished with stores of war at the expense of the crown — which they had already received to the value of £1000 — while they refused to provide salaries for the governor and other officers. Those considerations Dudley laid emphatically before the assembly, with an assertion of his knowledge of the interests of the province and desire to promote them and his assurance that their affairs would be improved if they thought so of their governor and gave a favorable reception to his servants. The board of trade had also written that the neglect of the queen's commands would show the general assembly to be undeserving of her favor and bounty toward them. At the session of February, 1704/5, Dudley told the house that he was very sensible that their neglect of some of the royal commands had interrupted the course of supplies to the province. The cost of the war had become very burdensome, the bills of credit were depreciating and a proposal was sent up from the house, but rejected by the governor and council, for paying the province debt in silver at the current rate of eight shillings per ounce. During the session of the following September these questions were brought to a decisive issue by the rejection on the part of the assembly of all the proposals of the crown. As to salaries it stated that the ability and circumstances of the province differed so from time to time that the settling of fixed salaries might be prejudicial to the colonists. The maintenance of this attitude was made almost inevitable by the suspicion, amounting approximately to knowledge, that Dudley was working for the recall of the charters and would welcome the decay of much that was cherished in the moral and religious, as well as the political, system of the Puritans. This view was confirmed in the minds of many by the publication in Massachusetts of a letter written by Paul Dudley, the son of the governor, in which he spoke of the affairs of government and the college being disposed of in private meetings and said that the country would never be worth living in for lawyers and gentlemen until the charter was taken away.¹ He and his father, he added, sometimes talked of the queen's establishing a court of chancery in the province and he had written to Blathwayt about it.² Such reports and suspicions as these made the Mathers and men of their type prefer as governor even a free liver like Sir Charles Hobby to the continuance of Dudley in office. But the opposition to the governor did not become formidable, while his services during the war were of great value. He was also a man of some property, and from this and his official sources of income was able to live tolerably, while he doubtless thought that it was better to take £500 or £700 a year than nothing at all. Thus it was that during his administration an acute crisis in the salary controversy was avoided. As to Pemaquid, when it was seen to be impossible to secure a fort there, Dudley made the very reasonable suggestion that a colony of English or Scotch families be planted there to hold the region against the French.¹

¹ C. O. 5/790; Journal of Upper House, Sess. of May to July, 1708.

¹ Hutchinson, II, 140.

² B. T. Journal for Feb. and March, 1703/4, and July 17, 1705, shows that the board of trade was consulting the attorney general on the possibility, consistently with the charter, of the queen establishing such a court and that Ashurst appear against it.

Of the relations which existed between Massachusetts and the other New England colonies during the second inter-colonial war — which was the period of Dudley's administration — much has been said in other connections. As the war was the interest of supreme importance, it led to the bestowment on Dudley, as upon his predecessors, of the command of the militia of the two corporate colonies. In the case of Rhode Island he made a serious, but futile effort to enforce his claim under this commission. Not even that was attempted in the case of Connecticut, and such cooperation as existed between it and Massachusetts during the war was attained as the result of negotiation or of such impulse as resulted from England assuming the leadership. Very little aid upon land was secured from Rhode Island, her activity being directed more toward the sea. Her trade relations were becoming extensive and privateering, with its accompaniment of illegal trade, absorbed much of her energies during the war. In accordance with the traditions of the previous century, Governor Cranston claimed vice-admiralty powers and issued commissions to privateers.

Until 1706, or somewhat later, Dudley, as is well known, was actively interested in the plans for the recall of the proprietary and corporate charters. Dudley's own statement of his attitude was that he was not an enemy of charter government, but rather of the men who on pretence of such a government rendered no obedience to the crown.² His criticisms were immediately directed against Rhode Island and Connecticut. The latter, because of her orderly government, he respected and, however hopeless he might be of overcoming her opposition, he never accused her of irregularities. But charges of this kind, in his letters home, he was constantly making against Rhode Island. The simple and primitive methods which there obtained, provoked his contempt, a large element in which was the feeling which nearly all colonial aristocrats entertained toward Quakers. From the beginning of his administration until he became absorbed in the larger military operation after 1706, and had at the same time to defend himself against serious charges, Dudley poured in to the British authorities a continuous series of complaints against these two colonies.

¹ B. T. N. Eng., O. P. C. O. 5/864. Dudley to B. T. Feb. 1, 1705/6.

² C. O. 5/912, Dudley to B. T., October 2, 1706.

To the earl of Nottingham he wrote that Rhode Island had rejected military control and admiralty jurisdiction and had made the enforcement of the acts of trade in Massachusetts almost impossible. This was due to the issue by Rhode Island of commissions to privateers, for which she had not authority and those who went to sea thus furnished had much the appearance of pirates. Atwood, to whose doings in New York as well as his tribulations as judge of admiralty for the northern district reference has elsewhere been made, had gone to England and Newton, the deputy judge, was only an ordinary attorney and had no estate in New England. He had condemned three prizes which had been brought in under Cranstons's commissions, thus recognizing these in derogation of the vice admiralty commission which Dudley had proclaimed at Newport. The figure made by the governor of Rhode Island, continued Dudley, was scarcely more than that of a head borough in England, and yet that colony possessed the best harbor and outlet in North America.¹ Was it any wonder that sailors and others fit for service ran away from the royal provinces to such a place, where was no government? In raising troops for Jamaica and for the war on the frontier Dudley claimed to have had experience of this kind.² The elective tenure of members of the council, as well as of assemblymen, made them absolutely dependent on the people. To Dudley it was an offence that only common men, and not men of estates, were chosen, and hence her majesty had no manner of service from them.¹ At the close of 1703 he wrote, that Rhode Island had not had a tax of a penny in the pound for this seven years. To statements of this kind, which were leading the board of trade to write letters of warning respecting cooperation in defence and the evils of illegal trade, Brenton added the report that sheep in increasing numbers were kept on the islands in Narragansett bay, on Block island and Nantucket, and that their wool was carried in small boats to the mainland and formed the material used in a flourishing industry.²

¹ C. O. 5/863, B. T. N. E., O. P., Dudley to Nottingham, Oct. to Dec., 1702.

² C. O. 5/910, Dudley to B. T., Nov. 10, 1702.

Dudley's relations with Connecticut involved him in the Mohegan controversy, and also with Palmes, Hallam and the group of malcontents about New London, who were engaged in what proved a hopeless contest with that colony. The partisan attitude which Dudley's commission assumed in reference to the Indians still further prejudiced the colony against him. For a time the imperialists seemed to have the upper hand, for beginning in 1704 and continuing at intervals until 1706, the board of trade and other authorities in England were clearly preparing for another assault in parliament on the proprietries and, in addition to South Carolina, the two corporate colonies of New England were furnishing the chief counts in the indictment. Ashurst vigorously fought it and the course which he championed was not defeated. After the failure of the bill of 1706 the movement against the proprietries ceased for the time to be dangerous, though some years later Ashurst wrote to Connecticut "ye Canaanite is in ye land and watches for Your halting." In reference to Ashurst Dudley wrote at this time that, though his equal in education and services to the crown, Ashurst had pursued him for twenty years and had interfered with his appointment as governor. After that he had hoped to have a rest from him, but it apparently was not to be. The memories of the Andros régime were revived, appeals were made anew to the cherished ideals of the colonies. Suspicion and dislike of Dudley were increased, and Ashurst lost no opportunity to promote it. Under these conditions the leadership in New England, which otherwise might have centred at Boston, was checked and Dudley could do little except with the resources of Massachusetts and New Hampshire. New England, which geographically was a distinct section and should have been, at least for military purposes, administratively united, remained, as in the seventeenth century, separated into a number of jealous colonies. The plan of union under the aegis of the British government proved as truly a failure as did that which had been formed at the beginning of the New England Council. During the later years of the war attention was drawn away to an extent from the distinctive problems of New England to those connected with the war in its wider aspects and the feeling against Dudley abated.

¹ Ibid., Dudley to B. T., Dec. 10, 1702; C. O. 5/911, Dudley to B. T., May 10, 1703.

² C. O. 5/911, Mar. 30, 1704.

Had it not been for the presence of the war and the success which in general attended its conduct, it is not improbable that Dudley would have found himself involved in more serious conflicts with his province and its assembly than actually occurred. Though a civilian, he possessed the knowledge, originality and initiative which well fitted him for the administrative tasks that the war imposed. With minor exceptions confidence in the management of the war was maintained from the first. The problem of protecting the frontier against the successive attacks of the French and Indians, of scouting and keeping the militia in training was a simple one. Such also was the fitting out of expeditions to the remoter parts. For all these purposes Dudley found no difficulty in securing the requisite appropriations. Still easier was it when England came directly to participate during the later years of the war. Thus it came about that Massachusetts reached the unexampled expenditure of £30,000 a year during the latter half of the war, and Dudley could boast not only of its liberality but of that of Connecticut as well. The pressure of the war, as an incitement to the Puritan spirit, was adequate to produce this result, and by the colonists at least it was regarded as more effective than any mere administrative and judicial measures could have been. Dudley, as the responsible head of the province and as efficient cooperator in this result, reaped the advantages which went with it. Outside of a limited circle he was never popular, but his ability was known and feared and a grudging respect was given him by the province at large. The success of his administration could not be gainsaid, and he had won it in the face of a prejudice deeper and more persistent than that which any other colonial governor had to meet, a prejudice to which all the narrow and intense moral convictions of the Puritan had contributed. He did not flatter his enemies nor flinch from them, but, being reasonably sure of his tenure of office, he quietly and firmly assumed the management of affairs and held it throughout his term. As compared with himself, his individual opponents were of slight importance and, when his administration closed, Massachusetts knew what it was to be governed by one of her own sons who was also a genuine representative of the crown.

Early in 1706 John Nelson wrote to Secretary Popple, of the board of trade, in support of Dudley and his administration against a faction which was opposing him. Nelson was an honest man and a good judge of the needs of the hour. Dudley's "capacity, experience and interest," he wrote, "render him to all intents the most proper for His Majesty's Interest and the good of this place," and they are very solicitous for his continuance. Nelson applied to Popple as the only proper medium for the communication of these "private thoughts," and he hoped that at a suitable time the secretary would lay them before the board.¹

The revelation in 1706 of the traffic which Vetch, Borland and their associates had carried on with the French in Acadia furnished the best opportunity that had yet presented itself for an attack upon Dudley by his enemies in Massachusetts. It was easy for them to charge him with complicity in this trade and to make the assumption that this charge was true the occasion for marshalling all other complaints, fancied or real, which had been accumulating for years. The vials of wrath which had long been pent up could then be poured out on his head. This was what occurred in 1707 and 1708, and the Mathers assumed the leading rôle among the accusers.

In view of their relations years before toward Andros and his government, and of what was more than suspected to be the inclination of Dudley toward episcopacy, it was not reasonable to expect that anything like sincere friendship could exist between the Mathers and the new governor. The venerable ex-president paid his respects to him in an election sermon. Dudley wrote to Cotton Mather on the prospects of his appointment and Mather wrote a letter in support of his candidacy for the governorship. On the arrival of Dudley at Boston he visited Cotton Mather and the latter told him that, in the colony there were various and divided apprehensions concerning the policy which he was likely to follow toward them, and advised him to carry an indifferent hand toward all parties. "By no means," he continued, "lett any People have cause to say that you take all your Measures from the two Mr. Mathers. By the same Rule I may say without offence, by no means lett any People say that you go by no Measures in your Conduct but Mr. Byfield's and Mr. Leveret's."¹ Dudley was unwise enough to report this foolish speech to the individuals concerned and that, wrote Mather, "influenced them into an implacable Rage against me."

¹ C. O. 5/864. O. P. N. Eng., 50, Aug. 8, 1706.

Willard was now president of the college and affairs moved on quietly there for some years. The Brattles were restored to the corporation and, with the settlement of the question of the charter in accordance with Dudley's suggestion, all prospect of Increase Mather being sent to England as agent vanished. In 1707 occurred the death of Willard and the election of John Leverett to the presidency. In one respect Leverett's career resembled Dudley's, for in harmony with the spirit of the age both had turned from the ministry to law and thence had passed into politics and official careers. The choice of a man who was essentially a layman to such a position was unprecedented in those times and anything but agreeable to the Mathers. But the election of Leverett also crushed the ardent hopes of Cotton Mather that he might succeed to the presidency. As Leverett and Dudley were on good terms and this appointment was in harmony with the trend of affairs which the governor favored and the Mathers opposed, it served to make further silence on their part impossible.¹

¹ Curwen MSS. Am. Antiq. Soc.; Hutchinson, Hist. of Mass. II, 115; Diary of Cotton Mather, I, 465.

Soon after the beginning of 1708 the Mathers, in their assumed position of spiritual advisers, wrote two letters to Dudley taking him to task in the severest terms for alleged corrupt connection with the traffic in Acadia, charging him also with bribery and with plotting to ruin the country.² The admonition of mediaeval pope to emperor never exceeded the cogency of this appeal. Dudley's reply might well rank as a classic in the literature of controversies of this kind. He did not deign to answer their specifications but, with a wealth of scripture quotations which even exceeded their own, showed how they had been led by the bitterness of their spirit to substitute reproaches and vilification for true Christian admonition. They should have been sure of their facts and not have raked together the accumulations of years of prejudice, jealousy and evil surmisings. He pronounced them incompetent judges and the spirit with which they had treated him as unjustified by reason, religion or common civility. One who compares this encounter between the governor and the clergy with the attitude of the elder Winthrop toward the admonitions of the same class will appreciate the change which had come over conditions in Massachusetts.

The Mathers did not cease their attack with this interchange of letters. In two pamphlets, both entitled substantially "The Deplorable State of New England," one published in Boston and the other in London, they soon after appealed to the public at large. Though these were anonymous and in the case of the second devices were adopted to make it appear to have been written in England, there is no doubt that they both emanated from the implacable Mathers.³ In the first the charge was exploited, that the plan for an exchange of prisoners, first at Quebec and afterwards in Acadia, was only intended to furnish an opportunity for illegal trading with the enemy. The alleged proof of this was found in the fact that the governor's son accompanied Vetch to Canada, that they carried a large store of goods suitable for the supply of the Indians and that they brought back only a few captives, and those individuals of minor importance. On the other hand, many and important French prisoners got their discharge. Ammunition, too, was furnished by Dudley to the Indians of Acadia and Maine and thus the means were given them with which to attack the English. Had it not been for the various supplies which they got in this way, the Indians would have perished from want. The presence of arms and ammunition, alleged to have been procured in Boston, on board a French vessel which came under protection of a flag of truce granted in connection with an exchange of prisoners, was hushed up by the Massachusetts government. Had it not been for the illegal trade which Dudley had promoted with the French and Indians, a large part of the many appropriations which it was necessary for Massachusetts to make for the war would have been unnecessary.

¹ In 1701 Wait Winthrop wrote to Ashurst about Leverett, then the speaker of the assembly, "who after the example of some others has left the university which he had begun upon and for which those yt were at the charge of his education had desighened him, and is now an attorney." Winthrop Papers, 6 Mass. Hist. Colls. V, 83.

² 1 Mass. Hist. Colls., III, 126-137.

³ Both are reprinted at the beginning of vol. II of Sewall's Diary, 5 Mass. Hist. Soc. VI, together with a defence of Dudley under the title of "A Modest Inquiry into the Grounds and Occasions of a late Pamphlet, etc."

Another charge, which was dwelt upon at length in both pamphlets, was the prevalence of bribery in the Massachusetts government under Dudley and the difficulty of getting any favors without influence or the payment of money. Without money, it was said, justice could not be had. Two or three affidavits in support of this charge were given. The encroachments of the admiralty court, especially in the cases of certain drift whales taken on Cape Cod, on a jurisdiction which, if exercised at all, had lain exclusively with the common law courts, was also condemned. In this connection Paul Dudley came in for criticism. The general conclusion was that the governor's goal was mammon and his drift was toward the ruin of the country.

In the second pamphlet much attention was paid to an address, signed by William Partridge, Thomas Newton, Nathaniel Higginson and others, which had been sent to the queen asking for the removal of Dudley, and especially to the steps taken by the governor to secure the adoption by the two houses of an address in opposition to the above.¹ It was charged that the council was browbeaten into its assent to this, so that later Judge Sewall, for reasons which he filed in writing, withdrew his affirmative vote.² Sewall's reasons indicate a sound judgment respecting the whole transaction. They were, that the personal interest of the governor was so deeply engaged in securing a favorable address that he did not leave the council sufficient chance to word it according to its own discretion. Sewall could not bring himself to "firmly Believe that the Governor did in no way Allow Mr. Borland and Capt. Vetch their Trading Voyage to Her Majesty's Enemies, the French," but he did not suspect that the governor by this "designed to Hurt the Province, but to Gratify Grateful Merchants." He also fully acknowledged the wisdom of Dudley's measures for defence of the province and rejoiced in their success. His Diary also shows that, though he received "many a Bite, many a hard Word" from Dudley, the men still remained friends. When the council, immediately after the above session, invited the governor to dinner, Sewall drank to his health and presented his duty to him. On the other hand, he stood by his old friend, Nathaniel Higginson, and could not admit that his address against Dudley was "a Scandalous and Wicked Accusation," as Dudley wished to term it. On this occasion, as in his acknowledgment of error in connection with the witchcraft trials in Salem, Sewall's conduct reached a high point of Christian excellence. The rest of the pamphlet was devoted to an account of the influence and coercion which Dudley and his supporters were alleged to have used with the members of the lower house to secure a favorable address, and even with clergymen and others outside in order to get expressions of approval from them. The fact that by Church's last expedition or in other ways, Port Royal had not been captured, was explained by the unwillingness of Dudley and his corrupt favorites to lose it as a centre for illegal trade with the enemy.

"The Modest Enquiry," which was published in England in reply to these attacks, was an attempt to show their triviality, while it presented, in the form of counter addresses and a recital of Dudley's notable services, evidence that his administration was a success and the continuance of it was desired by the body of the colonists. As this printed material all came before the board of trade and constituted part of a campaign to secure the governor's removal, he also submitted directly to the board a memorial in defence of himself.¹ In this, besides reviewing his past services to the crown and his successes in the war, he sought to discredit the testimony against him by impeaching the character of those who signed the affidavits, and showing that most of those who signed Higginson's memorial either were insignificant persons, or interested against Dudley, or those whose acquaintance with the province or the transactions of which they complained was too slight to give their statements weight. Favorable testimonials had been received from New Hampshire and these the governor included also in his defence. It, however, must be said that this form of evidence, similar to what was produced in so many cases, lacks precision and leaves the question at issue still in doubt.

¹ 5 Mass. Hist. Colls. VI, 130.

² Ibid., III, 202.

It was after the return of peace and in the later years of Dudley that the question of the currency became acute in Massachusetts. That issue had long been growing in importance, as the evils of depreciation increased. Though in New England the problem was not fundamentally different from that which presented itself in the other colonies, war and the prominence of trade and industry in that section brought it earlier and with greater emphasis to the front than was common elsewhere on the continent. In the discussion of this subject the intellectuality of the New Englanders was as evident as in the fields of theology and church government. They have always written and published much, and this characteristic appeared as clearly in their discussion of the currency as of the other eighteenth-century subjects. Upon the subject of the currency a considerable pamphlet literature developed in Massachusetts which, when added to the discussion that went on in the newspapers, far exceeded in amount all that emanated from the press upon this subject in the other colonies.¹ Though many of these publications were of slight importance, and the discussion throughout was marked by the crudities inseparable from the times prior to the development of economics as a science, considering the time and place it shows a curiosity and ingenuity of which the authors had no reason to be ashamed.

¹ C. O. 5/864, R. 66, referred to in Dudley's letter to the board of trade of Nov. 10, 1707.

The New Englanders had had their difficulties with barter, which the Massachusetts mint had been established to relieve. In common also with the other colonies they had suffered from a permanently unfavorable balance of trade. With the recall of the colony charter the mint had to be abandoned and its reestablishment was prohibited by the British government.² Soon the wars with the French and Indians began, and in order to meet the cost of Phips' expedition to Quebec Massachusetts had to resort to the issue of bills of credit. At first only £7000 were issued but the following year (1691) this was increased to £40,000 and that for the time was fixed as the limit. But the steady and severe pressure of the wars upon Massachusetts was believed to necessitate the abandonment of this limit and an indefinite succession of issues in the future.

Though the government of Massachusetts began issues of this kind nearly twenty years before the same policy was generally adopted by the colonies, the subject of credit substitutes for coin and barter had been discussed in New England at even a much earlier period. John Winthrop of Connecticut, was a man of curious and inquiring mind in reference to many subjects. By the middle of the seventeenth century he was pondering "proposalls concerning the way to trade and bank without money." He corresponded with Samuel Hartlib, the friend of Milton, on this subject. "The Key of Wealth," published in 1650 by William Potter, of London, certainly influenced Hartlib and through him may have become known to Winthrop. During his visit to England, soon after 1660, Winthrop submitted to the newly formed Royal Society, of which he had been made a fellow, some proposals concerning a bank and credit.¹ The discussion of a land bank, or one the security for whose issues should be land, had already been started in England, and of this plan Hartlib was a supporter. Winthrop seems to have differed from this view, but precisely in what way is not known, for no notice was taken of his plan in England and it was never published.

¹ This literature has been fully discussed and most of it reprinted by Andrew McFarland Davis, in his Currency and Banking in Massachusetts Bay, 3 Pubs. of Am. Econ. Assoc. I and II; his Tracts relating to the Currency of Massachusetts Bay; and his Colonial Currency Reprints, Pubs. of Prince Soc. 4 vols. J. Hammond Trumbull has also contributed to the subject in Pubs. of Am. Antiq. Soc., 1884. J. B. Felt, Hist. Account of Mass. Currency.

² See the order in council of Oct. 22, 1686. 4 Mass. Hist. Coll. II, 296. Cal. St. P. Col., 1685-1688, p. 66. Davis, Currency and Banking, I, 32.

In 1682 a pamphlet appeared in Massachusetts entitled, "Severals relating to the Fund." Its authorship has been attributed with reason to the Rev. John Woodbridge, of Newbury, a man of somewhat varied experience both in England and America and one whose interests were secular more than they were clerical. In 1649 William Potter himself had imparted to the writer his plan for a bank founded upon the personal credit of a considerable number of able men for the security of bills they might issue. This differed from the plan of a land bank, and may have been what Winthrop had in mind. Woodbridge became greatly interested in the plan and imparted it to some of his friends among the merchants, when he returned to New England. There it was discussed with approval. The attention of the council was attracted to it and an unsuccessful attempt seems to have been made, soon after 1670, to put the plan in operation. A decade later the plan was published in the pamphlet referred to, and the group of those who were interested may have circulated bills among themselves, based on a fund of capital which they mutually subscribed. In 1686, during the presidency of Dudley over the Dominion of New England, John Blackwell, then a merchant in Boston but a few years later striving to maintain the authority of the executive in the post of lieutenant governor of Pennsylvania, submitted to the council a plan for the establishment of a private bank. It was to issue bills based on land and movable capital as security, and thus help to supply the need of a medium of exchange caused by the decay of trade and the scarcity of coin that this scheme was proposed. It was approved by the council¹ and an elaborate prospectus with a plan for the organization of the bank was issued.² Dudley, Stoughton and Wait Winthrop were to act with Blackwell and others as assessors or managers. These same should be partners and investors, depositing money or other property in the capital fund of the bank. As most of those whose names are mentioned were members of the council, it is evident that a close connection with the government was intended. The plan seems to have been progressing toward an actual trial, when, in 1688, it was abandoned. The reason for this is not known, but it has been surmised that Andros was opposed to it and it may well have been that through him was expressed the opposition of the British government. The experience of banks upon the continent of Europe was not well understood at that time in England. Opinion there upon credit and the possible methods of its utilization was in an extremely undeveloped state, and naturally it was much less developed in the colonies. The times also were troubled and this, along with other schemes for corporate or semi-corporate activities in the colonies, failed to reach the experimental stage. With the exception of a single attempt in the general court, in 1700/1, to bring forward the plan again, nothing further appears concerning it until 1714. Notes of individuals were the only form of credit documents, except the colony bills of credit, which had appeared in Massachusetts and the part played by these notes of private parties was very slight and obscure.

¹ Proc. of Mass. Hist. Soc., 1878, p. 219; Davis, Currency and Banking II, 65.

Meantime the bills of credit, first of the colony and, after the grant of the charter, of the province, continued to be issued and kept in circulation. The continuance of the war was held to necessitate the early neglect of the limit which was originally set to the amount of these issues. New emissions were made annually, provision being made for the levy of taxes for their redemption at some specified time in the future and also that they should be received in payment of all public dues. The uncertain status of the colony government when the first issues were made, occasioned distrust and depreciation. To check this the merchants came to the rescue. Phips purchased a parcel of them with a quantity of ready money, and the government received them in payment of public dues at a premium of five per cent.¹ Notwithstanding the increased assurance which was afforded by the establishment of the government under the new charter and the fact that the successive acts of emission were not disallowed by the crown, the premium thus conceded had to be continued until 1720, in a vain effort to prevent depreciation. The old bills were successively called in and reissued, the original colony plates even being used until 1702. In this way the need of paper credit during the first two colonial wars was met and Massachusetts established the earliest precedents for its management in the colonies. By issues and reissues, continued until 1702, Massachusetts had put out about £82,000 in bills of credit, and they had passed freely. Under the governors who preceded Dudley no controversy over this subject had developed. The financial pressure which was caused by the second intercolonial war made it impossible to check the succession of annual issues. They continued until 1715, at the rate of from £10,000 to £58,000 yearly, in no year falling below £20,000. A total of £474,000 were thus put into circulation.² In the course of the war the period which was usually set for the redemption of these issues was extended from three to seven years. Thus Massachusetts had become deeply committed to a paper money régime by the time (1709 and 1710) when the other three New England colonies were beginning their issues.

¹ Dudley Records, Proc. Mass. Hist. Soc., 1899, pp. 24, 272.

² See "A Model for erecting a Bank of Credit, etc." London, Printed in the year 1688, Reprinted in Boston in New England in 1714. This is printed by Davis in his Tracts Relating to the Currency of Massachusetts. Two other pamphlets, published in 1691 and concerned with the same plan, are contained in Davis's Collection.

When it was decided not to permit the mint at Boston to be reopened, Andros was empowered to regulate by proclamation the rates at which foreign coins should circulate within the Dominion. With the growth of settlement and trade throughout the colonies in general, such regulation became an important matter. Owing to the lack of sterling and the opposition of the British government to the issue of coins from colonial mints, the colonists were forced to use the coinage chiefly of Spain and her dominions.¹ A defect in British colonial policy, comparable with her failure to provide permanent support for her governors, was that of neglecting, through colonial mints or otherwise, to furnish the colonists with an adequate coinage. As it was, they were left at first to the intolerable devices of barter, followed by the use of the confused and unstable system of Spanish coins. Standards of weights and fineness were uncertain and methods of coining crude. Clipping, or other forms of illegally reducing the weight of standard metal in coins, were very general and prevailed to an enormous extent in the West Indies. Following the natural currents of trade, it was chiefly from that quarter that the English colonies received the coins which were actually in use. English coins were not to be found there in large quantities and the English system of coinage served chiefly as an ideal standard to which the colonists sought to make the names, weight and fineness of their coins conform. But prior especially to the recoinage of 1696 the British coinage itself was in a very corrupt state, and the colonists do not seem to have actually known the weight of the standard British shilling. Barter currency or "Country pay" in the colonies ever tended to depreciate, as did the worn and clipped coins which were in circulation.

¹ Mather, Magnalia, Hartford ed. 1720, I, 174. Trumbull attributes to Mather one of the pamphlets of this period on the subject of a bank of credit.

² Kimball, Public Life of Joseph Dudley, 161.

The establishment of the mint at Boston in 1652 was an effort to bring locally some degree of order out of this chaos by furnishing Massachusetts with a coinage of shillings and smaller silver pieces, the metallic contents of which were some twenty-seven per cent less than sterling, so that the coins might be kept exclusively for colonial use. Their exportation from Massachusetts was strictly forbidden, but that proved futile and they were soon to be found widely distributed through the colonies. In 1672, in order to check the export of silver coins and relieve the consequent scarcity of money, the general court legalized the currency of pieces of eight—Spanish pieces of eight reals—the parent of the later American dollar, at six shillings. But this was an incorrect valuation and the situation had not greatly improved when, on the recall of the charter, the mint was closed and the pine-tree shilling soon disappeared from circulation.

¹ Sumner, The Coin Shilling of Massachusetts Bay, Yale Review, 1898; The Spanish Dollar and the Colonial Shilling, Am. Hist. Rev., 1898.

In 1692 the legislature of Massachusetts at last defined by weight the pieces of eight at seventeen penny weights, which was in accordance with the usage of the market. This act, however, was disallowed by the crown, because of the provisions which it contained in reference to clipping and other matters. In 1697 the above definition was repeated and it was declared that these coins should circulate as before, at six shillings, they being good Seville, pillar or Mexican pieces of eight. This legislation stood, though the rating was not exact, and became for the colonies the point of departure for certain important developments in the future. "It took up and made lawful," says Professor Sumner, "a state of things which had existed in all probability, by the custom of the market, since 1685. This law and this definition of a shilling were the point of departure for the following period, during which the clipping of silver and over issues of paper produced inflation and confusion." It was in an effort to remedy this that the proclamation of 1704, elsewhere referred to, was issued by the British government, and this was followed four years later by an act of parliament, the two together proving inadequate to remove the evil against which they were directed.

With the close of the war in Massachusetts came a rather definite alignment of parties on the subject of currency and banks. The members of the council, together with the more prosperous merchants and townspeople of the east, conservatives in general, insisted upon keeping the control of this matter in the hands of the government and not allowing a further increase of the bills of credit. Within this body a minority favored the retirement of the currency and return to a specie basis. Opposed to this group was a radical party, whose stronghold was in the country towns. It included the large class of debtors and those who, by reason of the war or from other causes, had failed to be prosperous or became financially involved. Their feelings were reflected by the majority of the house of representatives. They attributed their sufferings to the lack of an adequate quantity of money in circulation and favored larger issues and the prolonging of the periods set for their retirement. By this party the earlier proposals respecting a land bank were adopted and made a central plank in their platform. They demanded the establishment of an institution of this kind, which should issue to the people bills of credit secured by mortgages on their land, and this body of currency should be added to the paper which was already issued by the government. Thus the issue was drawn between the supporters of the land bank and the defenders of the so-called public bank or existing method of the restricted issue of bills of credit by the government,¹ and more than a generation was to pass before this question disappeared from Massachusetts politics. Dudley, as we have seen, had been one of the early supporters of the plan of a private bank, though with the idea that its issues should be secured by commodities in general and not wholly by land. Circumstances and the responsibilities of office had now changed his attitude and he appears as the first in the list of royal governors who were leaders in opposition to plans of this kind.

Early in 1701 a committee of the assembly had reported in favor of creating a land bank and giving it a monopoly of the issue of bills of credit. This proposal was rejected by the general court. It was not until February, 1714, that the proposal reappeared. A project was then advertised in the Boston "News Letter" for the establishment of a bank of credit, and subscriptions were opened for the purpose. Shortly after a joint committee was appointed in the general court to consider the best way in which to supply the deficiency of money and to facilitate the payment of public taxes, whether it should be projected upon a public or a private fund. The committee reported in favor of issues by the public. Though the plan of a private bank of issue was thus rejected, the discussion of the project was continued, especially by reprinting in Boston of Blackwell's scheme of 1686 and 1688 for a private bank,² with the emphasis now laid upon land as the favorite form of security. In addition to this the promoters issued a pamphlet of their own, entitled, "A Projection for Erecting a Bank of Credit in Boston, New England, Founded on Land Security.”¹ This was a prospectus for the formation of a company of the kind referred to, with a capital of £300,000. In an introductory paragraph the authors stated their point of view, which was to the effect that there was “a sensible decay in Trade,” and that it was due to the “want of a Medium of Exchange,” “The Running Cash being Exported, and considerable Sums of the Bills of Credit put forth by the Government, which had their Circulation and supported the Trade, being already drawn in, and the remaining lessening yearly by the payment of the Taxes and other Public Dues; so that without a Medium the Trade must necessarily decay, to the unspeakable detriment of the Landed Interest as well as the Trading Party.” The only prospect of relief, as viewed by the projectors, lay in the activity of such a bank as they proposed to establish. No one should subscribe more than £4000 and should pledge his real estate to the amount of his subscription as security. Loans of bills could then be obtained and the same currency should be given to those as to the bills of the province. As an encouragement to the project, the offer was held out that, when £150,000 had been issued, out of the profits £400 a year should be paid toward the support of a charitable school in Boston and £200 a year for the establishment of professorships and scholarships in Harvard College. Among the supporters of this project were John Colman, Elisha Cooke Jr., Timothy Thornton, Oliver Noyes and Nathaniel Oliver.

¹ Davis, Currency and Banking, II, 82 et seq.; Kimball, Joseph Dudley, 164; Journal of the Council of Massachusetts.

² Referred to and title quoted above.

Paul Dudley, attorney general, and son of the governor, at once presented before the council a memorial attacking the scheme.² From statements in one of the pamphlets of the time it appears that the promoters began with consulting the governor and secretary, and from the former they understood that he would favor the plan both at home and in England.³ They petitioned the general court for the necessary powers. It was at this juncture that Paul Dudley came out with his attack, which was directed chiefly against the legality of proceeding in such an enterprise as this without a charter from the crown, especially as its activities were to be so closely concerned with the royal prerogative of issuing and preserving the purity of the coin and money of the realm and dominions. It seemed also to the writer to come under the purview of the act respecting proclamation money. Under the influence of Dudley's attack the council ordered the projectors not to print their scheme or put the same on record or emit any of their notes or bills until they had laid their proposals before the general court. It was this order which led to the publication of the above statement concerning the interview with the governor. As Dudley is on record in a series of speeches to the general court, delivered at intervals since the beginning of his term, enforcing the necessity of limiting the issues of bills of credit and scrupulously living up to the provisions of the law in reference to their redemption, therefore, however diplomatic and non-committal he may have been in the interview the only report of which comes from partisans, it cannot be believed that he was in favor of a scheme like the land bank, which was fathered by one of his bitterest opponents and the effect of which would be to seriously inflate the currency.

¹ This is reprinted by Davis in his volume above referred to.

² Davis, Tracts relating to Currency of Massachusetts Bay, 153.

³ Ibid., 151 et seq.

In his speech at the beginning of the fall session of 1714 Dudley referred to the project of a land bank and its interest and expressed the hope that such action would be taken as would secure the honor of the British government and the security and benefit of the subjects in their trade.¹ A joint committee of the two houses was appointed, which reported in favor of meeting the alleged need for more currency by issuing £50,000, to be vested in trustees and loaned out in mortgages at five per cent interest.² This move threatened to shelve the plan for a private bank and was followed by the issue in pamphlet form of Paul Dudley's argument against the scheme. Two pamphlets were published in reply to him, in one of which the charge of bad faith was made against the governor.³ The controversy became very warm and extended throughout the province, Hutchinson stating that it "divided towns, parishes and particular families." By petition the land bank party carried their case to England, though there was not the slightest chance that the board of trade would give it an approval. Dudley also saw to it that Dummer, the agent, was instructed not to approve the application. But this was unnecessary, as the board was so clear on the subject that it did not hear it argued.

¹ Journal of the Upper House, Oct. 20, 1714.

² Hutchinson, II, 190.

³ All of these are reprinted by Davis.

Because of his opposition to the land bank, its supporters sought to procure Dudley's removal. With the death of Anne and the accession of the Hanoverians to the throne and the Whigs to power, Dudley had lost his friends at court. The bank party induced one Elizeus Burgess, who had served with Stanhope in Spain, to accept appointment as governor, promising not to interfere with their plans. William Tailer, who was appointed lieutenant governor, was also friendly to the land bank. In the council of Massachusetts also, after the six months following the death of Anne had passed, the period during which, according to the statute of the sixth of that queen, all who were in office at the demise of a monarch should continue to hold their places, and no word had come from England, or movement developed for the supplanting of Dudley, he proclaimed the accession of George I and, along with the other governors, received express authority to conduct the government until the period of six months after the death of the queen had passed. When, at the beginning of February, 1714/15, that period came to an end, several members of the council, among whom Sewall, Wait Winthrop, Hutchinson and Lynch were leaders, undertook to assume charge of the government under the presidency of their senior member. They issued a proclamation for the devolution of the government, certain commissions to officials, and prepared a proclamation for a fast. They were also preparing to write to England in explanation of their assuming charge of the government. But from Dudley they could secure no recognition of what they were doing, and on March 19 he received a royal proclamation continuing governors and other officials in their places till the king's further pleasure should be known. This was at once published and the plan upon which the council was entering with caution and misgiving was abandoned.¹

¹ Ford in 2 Proc. of Mass. Hist. Soc. XV, 327-362. The letter of Dudley to the board of trade, dated November 18, 1714, and telling how, notwithstanding the loss of a part of the dispatches by the wreck of the Hazard galley, news of the death of Anne was received and George I was duly proclaimed, is in C. O. 5/915. B. T. E. B. N. Eng. p. 155.

CHAPTER XXI

VIRGINIA DURING THE SECOND INTERCOLONIAL WAR

IN previous chapters attention has been called to the normal conditions under which Virginia had existed as a royal province from an early time. To this and to the homogeneous character of its population is to be attributed the quiet and uneventful course of its development, especially after Bacon's Rebellion. This is reflected in the sources of its history. As a rule, sessions of the assembly were held semi-annually. With the exception of Nicholson, during his two administrations, and Spotswood, the correspondence of the governors was limited in amount and rather commonplace in character. The same was true of the responses which came from the offices in England. The tobacco industry bulked large in the correspondence and to it the British merchants contributed material of interest. Considerable intervals also occurred during which Virginia was governed by a president and council, a condition which was almost always accompanied by a partial stagnation of public business. And yet the courts of the province, and of course the county justices, continued to perform their functions, and they were of great importance, especially in the field of social history. But they were regular and routine in their character and the events with which they were concerned do not particularly stir the imagination.

The fact that during the two generations which followed 1690 the history of Virginia did not abound in events of striking character should not lead to the conclusion that it was an unimportant colony. Far from that, it was second in importance to none whether on the continent or among the islands. It was made so by three cardinal facts; its typical form and place as a royal province, its economic structure, and its geographical position. The first of these characteristics has already been sufficiently explained. The second has reference to Virginia as the greatest producer of tobacco. As this was a leading semi-tropical staple and Virginia, in consequence of her devotion to it, became a colony of the plantation type, she belonged economically to the group which lay south of her. She, together with Maryland, formed the northern frontier, so to speak, of that great colonial area which produced the staples for the encouragement of which the mercantile policy of Great Britain had been developed. That territory extended indefinitely into the tropics and included on its southern British frontier the island of Barbadoes. North of Virginia and Maryland lay colonies of a different economic type, whose commercial relations with the mother country and whose industrial and social organization differed widely from the plantation type of colony. As New York was a frontier province in war and a strategic centre for all military purposes, Virginia stood in a similar position economically. Each was a pivotal colony in its own special relations.

Geographically also Virginia was central and held a position of leading importance. Some of the chief waterways of the Atlantic slope lay within her territory or adjacent to it. Her claims extended indefinitely westward and the passage across her mountain barrier led directly into the Ohio basin, which was the central avenue of approach to the Mississippi. When the time for this advance should come, Virginia was bound to hold a leading place in the winning of the west.

In any scheme of joint action which might affect the colonies as a whole Virginia, then, must hold a prominent place. As the typical royal province and chief seat of the tobacco industry imperialist policy, so far as it affected the continental colonies, must be determined to a considerable extent by her interests. Her business and social connections with Great Britain were more intimate than those of most colonies. But in general everything relating to her was so steady and harmonious that decade after decade passed without any stirring events. Growth also was not remarkable, because Virginia was fully caught within the restrictive circle thrown around the colonies by the acts of trade and passed this entire period of her history without a diversified industry and under a growing system of slave labor. Prices of the staple product ranged low and, though complaints of poverty and hard times were not quite so numerous as in Maryland, conditions in the two provinces could not have been essentially unlike.

During the period with which we are here concerned two men of more than average ability were at the head of Virginia affairs, Francis Nicholson and Alexander Spotswood. Between the two came the brief administration of Edward Nott, followed by a period of four years, (1706–1710) during which Edward Jennings administered affairs as president of the council. The fact that Virginia, during the war, was left for so long a time without a governor was due to the capture by the French of Robert Hunter, who had been appointed as Nott's successor, and his failure to reach the province. On his release he was sent, as we have seen, to New York and Spotswood became governor of Virginia.

Early in 1699 Nicholson began his second term in Virginia, this time with the full rank of governor. In 1704 began, however, the appointment of titular governors, who resided in England and by assistance given to the agents of the province, in helping to moderate disputes and possibly in other ways, exerted some influence on events. The first of these was the earl of Orkney, who held the position for thirty-three years — 1704–1737. He was succeeded by the earl of Albemarle — 1737–1754 — who was an officer of high rank in the army and later was ambassador to France and one of the lords justices. Upon the death of Albemarle the office was bestowed in succession on the earl of Loudon and Sir Jeffrey Amherst, both of whom, by virtue of the commands which they held over the army then serving in America, were as much absentees from Virginia as their predecessors had been. With the retirement of Amherst from the office in 1768, the line of titular governors came to an end. Those who actually administered the office under these dignitaries ranked only as lieutenant governors, though the commissions and instructions given to the two were practically identical. Out of the salary of £2000, the sum of £1200 was paid to the non-resident, the lieutenant governor keeping £800. The amount of the salary remained fixed, but with the growth of the province the perquisites of the office increased until the total income of the office reached the sum of £4000 toward the time of the Revolution. Until, about 1720, a residence was provided for the governor, a special appropriation was made for his house rent. When a senior councillor served as governor, the sum of £500, taken from the governor's salary, was added to the remuneration which he received as councillor. Gifts were occasionally made by the burgesses to the lieutenant governors, but these simply expressed appreciation of their services, for no controversy over the governor's salary ever arose in Virginia.¹

Commissary Blair stated that it was chiefly through his own efforts and the support of the bishops in England that the appointment of Nicholson was made, and that this made it unnecessary to expend the money which Nicholson was ready to supply to procure the office. Before he left Maryland signs of growing arbitrariness and passion had appeared in Nicholson's conduct, and these had involved him in some needlessly bitter controversies. Gerard Sly, John Coode and others had complained of this,² and Sly had laid charges before Secretary Vernon, but there is no evidence that they produced any effect or that their truth or falsehood were inquired into at the time when Nicholson's new appointment was being considered. In his first letter as governor of Virginia he made light of the charges, as the slanders of malcontents who were plotting evil against the king's government. The reputation of Coode was certainly not such as to add weight to any charges with which his name was concerned.

Relations between Nicholson and Andros as governors of Maryland and Virginia had not been cordial. This had been shown in connection with efforts to procure the arrest of Coode after his flight from Maryland and perhaps in other matters. Andros, therefore, when he left Virginia, gave Nicholson no account of the state of the province as to revenue, defences or other matters.³ Of this Nicholson complained to the authorities in England and applied to William Byrd, the auditor, and to the gunners at various points for a part of the information which he desired. After the manner of new governors, he reported that he found Virginia financially in a worse condition than when he left it seven years before. Byrd reported that there was a deficit of £4200 in the revenue from the export duty on tobacco and that the province was somewhat in debt. But on further inquiry the arrears were found to be smaller than had been anticipated, while the tobacco crop had been good and there were nearly enough ships in Virginia to take it to England.¹ The court house at Jamestown had been burned and, as the College was already settled at Middle Plantation, it was soon resolved that a new government house or capitol should be built there.² This occupied considerable attention throughout Nicholson's administration, as did the question of a residence for the governor soon after that time. By these means Williamsburg was founded and the capital of the province was removed thither. This was all in harmony with the governor's instructions from England, and in connection with the building of the capitol Nicholson made many valuable suggestions for the better classification of public business and preservation of the records. Some of these were carried into practice. In part to pay for this building, a duty was laid by the general assembly, in its session of April, 1699, upon the importation of liquors, except those which came from the realm, and also on servants and slaves imported into the province.³

¹ Flippen, The Royal Government of Virginia, 1624-1775, C. U. Studies.

² Cal. St. P. Col., 1697-98, pp. 245, 290; Perry, Hist. Colls. of Am. Col. Church, Virginia, 75.

³ Cal. St. P. Col., 1699, p. 47 et seq., 170.

Nicholson submitted a number of his instructions, at the session of the assembly the same spring, thus giving them an opportunity again to express their traditional views, which in many respects were not in agreement with the desires of the home government.⁴ For example, they did not approve of the proposal to empower the governor and council to raise a general levy to meet emergencies; they were opposed to the maintenance of fortifications along the coast and insisted that Virginia must be protected, if at all, by a naval force; the province could not afford to build public workhouses for the employment of the poor and it would also be very burdensome,

¹ Ibid., 309.

² Ibid., 224, 249, 269, 278.

³ Hening, Statutes, III, 189 et seq.

⁴ Cal. St. P. Col., 1699, pp. 202, 260 et seq.

if not dangerous, to list and arm Christian servants, for as some Irish Catholics and others who had been soldiers had recently been brought into the province, they were as likely to prove enemies as friends; the levy by poll they considered the best and most equal form of tax; free trade with the Indians they favored, and, as to their conversion, they were content to leave that to the college; negroes born in the country were generally baptized, but it was impossible to make any progress toward the conversion of those who had been recently imported. Efforts to assert the claims of the college and of other would-be settlers in the Pamunkey and Blackwater regions imperilled the permanence of Indian treaties and, in the case of the Blackwater region, led to conflicts of jurisdiction which brought to the front the question of the North Carolina boundary.¹ Commissioners came from that province at this time, to arrange, if possible, for running the line, but on the plea that the appointment of Governor Harvey, who sent them, had not been approved by the king, the governor and council of Virginia resolved not to proceed until an instruction for the settlement of the boundary was received from England.

For additional evidence respecting the questions which, at this time, interested the people of Virginia, as they were distributed through the counties, the numerous statements of grievances which were presented to the assembly of 1699 are enlightening.² Several of the counties complained about the times and places of the sessions of the courts, both the general court and the county courts; the appointment of a coroner in every county was urged; the sale of liquor near court houses was complained of by one county; the rates at which foreign coins should circulate also received considerable attention and the burgesses issued a series of resolves on the subject; various aspects of parish government and finance were brought forward; the fixing of the boundaries of counties and parishes or changes in them so that, for the sake of church attendance for one thing, no parish should be divided by one of the large rivers of the province, received much attention, especially from the governor; a demand for the passage of an act to prevent undue elections was acceded to by the assembly; relations with the Indians received some slight attention and in addition a variety of other petty concerns from the unreasonable killing of deer and the stealing of hogs to the exportation of old iron. Several of the cases of evil conduct to which reference was made were guarded against in one of Nicholson's favorite acts against immorality and for the suppression of blasphemy, swearing, drunkenness and Sabbath breaking, which was placed on the statute book at this session.¹ This all shows that society was static, its advance since Bacon's Rebellion being chiefly in bulk, with the colonial aristocracy firmly established in control.

¹ Ibid., 77, 186, 200.

² Ibid., 198.

Another subject of considerable importance, which was recommended to the governor by the board of trade, was the revisal of the laws. As there had been no revisal since 1662, the statutes of the province were in great confusion, for the reason that many had expired or become obsolete and others had been repealed. The necessity of action on this subject was clear and is said to have failed at the last session because of pressure of other business. The plan of the board of trade was that the revision should be made by the governor with the advice of the council, that each act be then passed separately by the general assembly and that nothing be included in any act of a nature different from its title. But this method was not followed. During the present session an act was passed by which this work was intrusted to a permanent committee, with an instruction to report the results of its work to the legislature at successive sessions until it should be completed.² This was continued until 1706, when thirty-nine bills were submitted for approval. In 1704 Edward Jennings had been sent to England with the bills as they then stood, and they had been examined by the board of trade and such changes as it judged necessary incorporated and then they were taken back to Virginia to be finally passed by the governor and general assembly.³ But either by the veto of the governor or as a result of disagreement between the houses three of the most important of the bills failed. These were the acts concerning the church and clergy, the act for regulating county courts and the probate of wills and administration of estates, and the act for securing the liberty of the subject, the object of which was to give Virginians the benefit of habeas corpus. Because of the failure to include these laws, the revisal of 1706 was considered so imperfect that it was not printed and the whole matter was shelved until Spotswood's administration, when it was again taken up, though a satisfactory revision was not completed and published until 1733.

¹ Hening, III, 168.

² Ibid., 181; Cal. St. P. Col., 1700 pp. 6, 11.

³ E. B. Va. C. O. 5/1360, ff. 429-434, 459; C. O. 5/1361, ff. 27-28; Journal of Burgesses, 1702-1706, et seq.; introd. XXVIII, et seq. The laws contained in this revisal are printed in Hening III, 229-481, under the session of October, 1705.

In the long letter which Nicholson wrote to the board of trade after the close of this session, and accompanying the transmission of its journals, he explained the condition of the finances and expressed the opinion that the offices of receiver and auditor — both held by William Byrd — should be separated. He had visited Governor Blakiston in Maryland and they both agreed that, if a lieutenant governor of those two provinces was appointed, he would prevent them from falling under the weak rule of a president and council in case the governor of either should be absent or die. Connected with this was Nicholson's first statement, in this administration, as to the difficulty he had in getting a quorum of the council to attend for business.¹ This was a subject on which he had often to discourse. A year later he wrote that John Custis and Robert Carter made constant excuses for not attending.² Ralph Wormley, the secretary, who lived fifty miles away, had absented himself for nearly two years, the office being managed by the clerk of the general court and visited occasionally by the deputy secretary. Daniel Parker was said to be in England, but Nicholson had not been informed that he had the king's leave. Richard Lee was excused on petition. So, in August, 1700, there were but nine members at all available. Of these Scarborough, Carter and Custis, especially the two East Shore men, Nicholson did not expect to see at any sessions except those of the general courts or assemblies. Very often the other six councillors were sick, lame or had special business so that they could not attend. The concentration of offices in the hands of councillors Nicholson did not approve, as it led to neglect of the one function or the other.

¹ Cal. St. P. Col., 1699, p. 309 et seq.

² Ibid., 1700, Letter of Aug. 1; C. O. 5/1311, O. P. Va. No. 19, Statement by Nicholson of places of residence of councillors.

The office of secretary, with its manifold functions, was an object of much attention from Nicholson.¹ He described its occupant as the "custus rotulorum" of the province, the county clerks holding commissions from him and they and the general court trying cases of all kinds. But Nicholson intended to keep the records of the admiralty court in the control of its register and out of the hands of the secretary. On the death of Wormley, in 1701, Edward Jennings, who had been deputy, succeeded to the secretaryship and affairs in the office were presumably better managed. The statements of the governor about the council and the office of secretary were confirmed by both Ludwell and Quarry, the latter adding that it was difficult to get a qualified person for clerk of court or attorney general who would reside at the seat of government. Among other evils, salaries were too small.² The board of trade had also ordered that the secretary furnish a detailed account of procedure in all the Virginia courts, and an abstract of all business done in his office. The secretary protested that that would amount nearly to an abstract of the laws and constitution of Virginia and asked for compensation and for access to the records of all the offices concerned. In view of all this, it is not strange that, as the new capitol approached completion, we find Nicholson planning accommodation in all available parts of it for officials and their papers.

In 1700, under encouragement from the British government, a body of about two hundred French Protestant refugees arrived in Virginia. Some additions were made to their number at a later date. At first it was proposed that they should settle in Norfolk county, but as that region was in dispute between Virginia and North Carolina, the council decided that they should be granted some unpatented land at Manakin Town, on the James river about twenty miles above the Falls. Auditor Byrd and Benjamin Harrison were designated to take charge of them until they were fully settled,¹ and this required a good deal of attention because, as they arrived in the summer and without means, they had to be supported until their first crop could be harvested the next year. As was usual, the governor and council were more solicitous for their welfare during this interval than were the burgesses. The latter refused to consider the French as objects of charity and appropriated nothing for their support. But the council caused briefs to be circulated through the province and gifts collected for their temporary support. It, however, asked the governor to inform the queen of the poverty of the refugees and the disability of the province and to ask that no more be sent. In the spring of 1702 a cargo of goods sent by the order of the archbishop of Canterbury and the bishop of London arrived, with orders that they should be sold and the money applied to the purchase of cattle and other necessities for the French.

¹ Cal. St. P. Col., 1699, p. 312 etc.

² C. O. 5/1360, E. B. Va. ff. 84, 102-107.

Though Nicholson thought the French would be valuable as a protection to the frontier, he saw the possibility of their injuring the queen's interest by living together, using their own language and customs and engaging in such handicrafts and trade as England had. Orders were issued that the lands which they held must be surveyed and they must hold by English tenures. This was duly executed by the administration of the oaths and the French community continued to exist under the general rules which governed frontier settlements. They were soon organized as King William's parish, while the method of their naturalization was left to the council committee on the revision of the laws. The result was the passage of a law authorizing naturalization by action of the executive, which was incorporated in the revisal of 1705.²

By the beginning of 1701 war was regarded as certain and from that time through the earlier years of the struggle many references appear in all the Virginia sources to convoys and

¹ Cal. St. P. Col., 1700, pp. 449, 472, 620, 656, 745, 760, 762; 1701, pp. 408; Perry, Hist. Colls. of Am. Colonial Church, Virginia, 118; Journal of Burgesses, Dec. 19, 1700 et seq.

² Hening, 111, 434; Nicholson to the board of trade, Aug. 1, 1700; C. O. 5/1410. Minutes of Ex. Council of Va. 1701, 1702. Journal of Burgesses, April 26, 1704 et seq.

to the requirement that Virginia and Maryland vessels should go in fleets. Owing to the fact that tobacco was the only staple, this was a subject of importance to only these two among the continental colonies. In May the collectors and naval officers were ordered by the governor and council not to clear any ships after June 6, and that those cleared should meet at the mouth of the James river and organize into a fleet. They were to sail about June 12 and after that time none should depart until further orders. The accounts of naval officers and collectors should be made up in time to be sent by the fleet. Word was sent to Maryland by the sloop "Messenger," and it was to bring in the Maryland contingent.¹ The "Southampton" was coming to relieve the "Shoreham" and the latter was going home with the fleet. But because of the failure of the "Southampton" to arrive in time, it was resolved to continue the embargo until the twentieth of June. Meantime ships from Maryland were daily leaving in spite of the embargo, which caused great dissatisfaction to the Virginia masters. A strong representation was presented to the governor and council by the masters, alleging that the delay was costing them £100 daily, while if they sailed at once they might arrive before the outbreak of war. As the captain of the "Shoreham" declined to sail before he was relieved and there were several other royal ships in Virginia waters, one of these finally agreed to accompany the fleet twenty leagues or so to sea, while three armed merchant vessels were ordered to sail as permanent convoy. This solution of the difficulty was due largely to Nicholson and for his untiring zeal in the matter the masters voted him their thanks. Fifty-five or more vessels sailed under this convoy, and the affair, taken as a whole, well illustrates the conditions under which trade was then carried on in time of war.²

¹ In C. O. 5/1313, 14, is a statement on the subject of convoys as it was in 1704. Further on in the volume is an account of Capt. Moodie of H. M. S. "Southampton" and its experience as a convoy. See the papers concerning the advice boat "Eagle," K5; and more relating to convoys in 1704 appears in the same vol. of Original Papers Va., and Va. Entry Book (C. O. 5/1360) under 1702 and 1703. In Va. Council Minutes, C. O. 5/1412, are also various entries on this subject for 1702 and 1703.

² In the original Papers, Entry Books and other sources of Virginia and Maryland history during this period is much additional matter relating to fleets and convoys which might be used in a detailed study of trade in time of war.

During the interval between the two wars the peace of Virginia had been once disturbed by a brisk fight between the station ship "Shoreham" and a French pirate vessel.¹ Nicholson was on board the "Shoreham" and took an active part. The pirate was captured and eight of her men were hung and one hundred or more were sent to England by the Essex Prize, which was convoying part of the Virginia fleet. Because of the danger from pirates who were known at that time to be hovering off the coast, the militia of the coast counties was ordered out, lookouts were appointed and steps were taken to secure suspicious persons who might come on shore. A reward was offered for the arrest of pirates and other precautionary measures were taken, but no further disturbance occurred. This minor event illustrates the measures to which Virginia would have to resort, had a French force appeared on her coast during the war, and the possibility that such a descent might occur—though it never actually occurred—furnished her with a permanent excuse for refusal to act in other directions.

With the approach of war the activity of Nicholson in devising precautionary measures was again exhibited and the council cooperated with him. Early in July, 1701, the governor and council ordered a proclamation to be issued to the commissioners of every county to return an account of all arms and ammunition in their counties and of the persons in whose custody they were. None of these should be exported. The militia, horse and foot, should be well equipped and kept in readiness to muster on an hour's warning. Because of a report that a French expedition had been fitted out against the West Indies, the militia was ordered to be mustered and trained. Delinquents should be punished according to law. From the troops every fifth man— young and brisk—should be selected and these formed into troops for special service, under officers of their own choice. Lookouts should be stationed along the coast. The general assembly was called to meet on the sixth of August, when the public levy would be laid, and the clerks of every county court were ordered to send to the assembly a true list of the tithables in their counties. At some convenient time before the assembly met a court of claims should be held, in order that burgesses might receive all grievances and propositions from their counties to lay before the assembly. A letter which lately had been received from Secretary Vernon was referred to the committee which was already at work on the revision of the laws. This letter contained a number of queries, the purpose of which was to suggest improvements in the militia system: — that the firearms used should be all of them of the same pattern; that the militia should consist wholly of horse and dragoons, as infantry was of little use; that there should be a magazine in every county; that public prizes should be offered for marksmanship and other feats; that there should be a muster-master on every neck to keep exact lists of the militia.

¹ Cal. St. P. Col., 1700, p. 307 et seq.; Ex. Council Minutes.

After the session had begun the council resolved to submit to the burgesses proposals to the effect that steps be taken to provide the inhabitants with the entire equipment which they needed to meet sudden attacks, that two skilled engineers should be brought from England, that ferries and bridges be kept in good order and care taken for the speedy conveyance of public letters, that seamen be prevented from deserting and vessels from stealing away in spite of embargoes, and that Christian servants should not be mustered. These were ideals to which measures, as actually adopted, made a remote approximation.

At this very time one William Clay, who had been on the Mississippi, reported that the French were making a settlement there. He also told how he had reported the same to the governor of South Carolina and had told him, as he now stated in Virginia, that he was ready to return to the Mississippi and break up the French settlement. This was in confirmation of the report of Dr. Coxe of what was to be expected in the southwest, and it must have suggested to all the southern tier of colonies the possibility that they might yet have to fight for the preservation of their western frontiers.

But for the present their attention was chiefly centred on the condition of the militia in general, with a view to coast defence. In the course of September, 1701, the governor was able to lay before the council an abstract of all the militia of Virginia, a considerable part of whom were neither well equipped or disciplined. He feared that it would take at least two weeks to call out as many as a thousand armed men to meet an invasion, and during that time an enemy, if he landed, could do great damage. The governor would also be hampered by a law of 1684 which provided that no man's arms or ammunition could be impressed from him. Nicholson wanted that law amended in order that the men actually drafted might be better equipped, and that arms should be bought both in Virginia and England. In order properly to meet expenditures, he desired that an additional duty of 6d. per hogshead be laid for one year on exported tobacco, and that the levy per poll be at the rate of fifteen pounds of tobacco, the increased revenue to be used for arms and other military necessities. The bills of exchange for this could be sent by the "Shoreham" and "Lincoln," which were going late in the autumn to convoy the fleet to England. The council agreed that a law ought to be passed giving to the governor, with its approval, the power to impress all arms and ammunition found in Virginia, to be paid for by the public and that after the service was over all which remained should be placed in the public magazine. An act was passed for strengthening the frontiers by encouraging group settlements there—in pursuance of which apparently nothing was ever done—and specifying the steps which should be taken on the spread of alarms from the coast or the interior. No addition was made to appropriations.

After the close of this session of the assembly both Nicholson and Quarry sent to the board of trade very similar and very unfavorable accounts of the state of defence in Virginia. As Quarry was present at the assembly, he could also write from a pretty definite knowledge of the situation, though it is not improbable that the two officials wrote with a full knowledge and agreement as to the contents of their epistles. The total number who were liable to military service was about 8000, but they were so undisciplined and so poorly equipped that the writers did not believe that one-fourth of them were fit to oppose the enemy. Virginia had known no conflicts except those of Bacon's Rebellion, and there now were very few survivors who had participated even in the petty encounters of that time. Nicholson knew of no man who was fit to command even a body of 300 or 400 men or to attack an enemy or defend a place. He then described in detail the poor condition in which the most exposed coast and frontier counties were and how 700 or 800 French and Indians might ravage the upper parts of the province before a force could be marched to attack them. It was also evident that, so far as the coast was concerned, an English squadron would be the only protection against a French attack. It was the old story, true on the whole, of all the colonies since their settlement and to continue so long as they were colonies and long afterward. Their chief security was to be found in the fact that the French in Canada were even weaker than they. As a result of the letters of Nicholson and Quarry a quantity of arms and ammunition was sent to Virginia in 1702 and that led to various orders by the council there as to the distribution of them among the counties and threatening the prosecution of individuals who failed to purchase what were needed for their supply.¹

Virginia was in a situation of this kind when the requisition of January, 1700/1, came from England, to the effect that £900 sterling and also a quota of men, if the governor should call for them, should be sent from Virginia to the aid of New York. This called forth an address to the king from the house of burgesses, in which they went to the extreme of charging New York with having as its object the monopolizing of trade with the northern Indians in beaver and deer skins.² Making use of the report which had been brought by Clay, they laid increased emphasis on the claim that Virginia was as directly exposed to French and Indian attack as was New York, and therefore that Virginia was a barrier to the northern colonies as well as they to it. It took fifty years more of history to make it appear that this was in any sense a fact. They went on to contrast the alleged richer trade and "more plentiful estates" of New York with "our hard labour in making tobacco, the profit whereof is exhausted by customs and impositions that amount to three or four times the price of the first cost we have for it, the lasting cause of the poverty of this country." This interesting statement throws light on the ease with which the colonists could use what they claimed to be the effect of the imperialistic policy concerning trade as an argument with which to oppose the same imperialistic policy as to defence. The burgesses then dwelt on the sums which they were expending in the revisal of their laws, in buying land and erecting public buildings at Williamsburg and in protecting themselves against pirates. They dwelt on the efforts they were making for the defence of their own frontiers and that their funds were so exhausted and inadequate that they had laid taxes even upon their servants and slaves. They claimed to be as weak in men and arms as they were poor in money, when the extent of the frontier which they must protect was taken into consideration.

¹ Ex. Council Minutes, 1701, 1702; C. O. 5/1360, Entry Book 1701; Memorial of Quarry, Mar. 17, 1701/2; Letter of Nicholson, Dec. 2; Cal. St. P. Col., under those dates.

² Cal. St. P. Col., 1701, p. 540; J. of Burgesses, Sept. 27, 1701.

As arguments against sending a quota of men to New York, they dwelt on the difficulty and cost of transporting them thither and the probability that they would arrive there too late for assistance. For every man who was taken out of Virginia for three months, and so from the active production of tobacco, they estimated the amount that the king would lose £20 sterling in customs. On the first notice of a draft, single men and the poorer housekeepers would begin to remove into other provinces, and hence the men to be detached must be freeholders of the better class, and while they were absent their servants and slaves would not raise above half the usual crops of tobacco on their plantations. Therefore persistence in the sending of quotas would probably have as its final result the loss of Virginia and Maryland to the crown.

This statement may be regarded as exhausting the arguments which could be used against the proposed requisition. They had not been by any means so fully stated in the previous war, and during the remainder of the present war it was only necessary to refer to this address and repeat some of its statements. In view of all the conditions which existed the decision which was reached as to the sending of troops was the necessary and only possible one; especially was this true in view of the fact that New York was not engaged in the war until 1709. But the arguments which were used were grossly exaggerated and do not prove that the resources which Virginia could have made available, were inadequate to the effort.

The same question was brought up again in the session of March and April, 1702/3 by a repetition of the order from the crown for aid in men and money to New York. Lord Cornbury had also written more than once to Nicholson on the subject. War was now actually in progress and New York could and did lay emphasis on her need of coast defence, as for the time greater than that of additional frontier posts. As a means of bringing influence to bear on the burgesses, the governor first brought the question before the council, both in executive and legislative session. He also offered again to lend the money himself without interest, if it was proven that the province could not advance it, though he thought that after the deduction of all debts charged against Virginia about half of the amount required was already in bank. The council declared that it would gladly use messages, conferences, or other proper means, as occasion suggested, but they could not violate precedents which left to the lower house the initiative in the making of appropriations. Nicholson's futile reply to this frank acknowledgment by the council of its inferiority in the matter of appropriations was, that he could not allow precedents to interfere with the prerogatives of the crown.

In the burgesses a motion for a free conference with the council at the start was voted down. Then a resolution was unanimously passed that Virginia was not able to furnish the £900 to New York. With this the council was asked to concur and, if they did so, then to appoint a committee to confer with a house committee on the best way of making a representation on the subject to the queen. When this decision reached the council, Nicholson told its members that they should now inquire into the public accounts and the state of the country, to see if the claim of inability was true. The council then desired a free conference, but the burgesses refused to enter upon it until the council had either accepted or rejected the above resolution. The council replied that they desired a conference in order to find out whether or not the country was able to bear the expense and also because it was an approved method of clearing up doubts and keeping a good understanding between the houses. After some further discussion along the same line, the burgesses took advantage of the fact that Nicholson had just urged them to undertake the revision of the laws to plead that as an excuse for asking that the session be closed. Other reasons which they gave in support of the same request were these, that the general court was then in session and would occupy much of the time of the councillors, and also that in the new town of Williamsburg, where the assembly was now meeting for the first time, there were few houses and some of the members had to lodge at a distance and with very ordinary entertainment. The council, in executive session, then advised that the assembly be prorogued, and after the burgesses had prepared their address to the queen stating again the reasons against sending aid to New York which had been given in 1701,¹ the session closed.

It was in harmony with the character and policy of Nicholson that he should make much of conferences between governors. Reference has elsewhere been made to an abortive plan of this kind which he tried to execute in 1699. During the summer of 1703, pursuant to the desire of the board of trade, Nicholson visited Cornbury at New York and conferred with him in relation to attacking Canada.² At this time he advanced £900 toward the cause, lest it might have a bad effect if the French learned of the refusal of Virginia to contribute it; but his bills at this time were apparently cancelled. When he returned he told the Virginia council what he had heard in New York of the poor state of the defences on that frontier, and expressed the opinion that, if the French made an advance there, it would be necessary to send a strong force from Virginia. With this all effort to enforce the requisition upon Virginia for aid to New York ceased and, as we have seen, when preparations were made for the expeditions of 1709 and 1711 against Canada, no effort was made to procure assistance from colonies south of Pennsylvania.

¹ C. O. 5/1412, Ex. Council Minutes, March, 1702/3 et seq.; Journal of Council in Ass. and Journal of Burgesses of same date.

² Ex. Council minutes, Va., Apr. 24, 1703; C. O. 5/1313, O. P. Va., K 15; C. O. 5/1360, Entry Book, Va., ff. 174-178, 180-183. Nicholson to board of trade, July 23, 1703; B. T. to Nicholson Feb. 16, 1703/4.

The general harmony which had existed in Virginia during the previous war and in Nicholson's first administration was not continued at this time. While relations with New York were under discussion the governor was engaged in a violent controversy with some half-dozen prominent members of the council. Among these Commissary Blair was the leader, and with him Beverley, Ludwell and Harrison were very prominently associated. Owing to relations of an intensely personal nature, the family of Lewis Burwell became closely involved, as did two clergymen, Fonace and Wallace. Captain Moodie, of the guardship Southampton, had had some discussion with Nicholson and the council, during the winter of 1702/3, over a conflict between his orders from the admiralty¹ to sail to England by way of Newfoundland and the desire of the Virginia authorities that he should convoy their fleet and that of Maryland directly across. The governor and council insisted that if they sent to the secretary of state a copy of the records of their proceedings it would be a sufficient indemnity for Moodie. Nicholson also furnished the captain with credit for £100 which he desired. But the correspondence revealed the fact that the government of Virginia had been sharply criticised in some respects for its treatment of the king's ships, while Moodie in turn charged Nicholson with using abusive language to him. He therefore joined in the general complaints against the governor.

The case which now developed, like those of Phips in Massachusetts and Fletcher in New York, involved sweeping charges of misconduct against a governor, which were made the reason of a demand for his removal. The charges concerned matters far different from those which were cited in the case of the New York governor, though they were quite as illustrative of colonial government as it then was. It has already been stated that, during his administration in Maryland, Nicholson had been charged with giving way to fits of passion and using opprobrious language. This reputation followed him when he came the second time to Virginia. The quarrel between Nicholson and Blair began with the delivery to the governor, soon after his appointment, of letters from the bishop of London and others cautioning him to greater moderation of speech and conduct. These, taken in connection with the advice which Blair himself gave, occasioned another outburst. Finally Nicholson told Blair to attend to his ecclesiastical business and leave government alone. Because of the governor's zeal for the church and his activity in its service, as well as that of the state, some time passed even after this before Blair broke entirely with him. But things had come to such a pass by 1704, that the above mentioned parties made complaint against the governor in England, Blair going thither as the chief agent for the purpose and submitting a long list of charges, supported by affidavits.

¹ C. O. 5/1313, I, 30, Original Papers, Va.

So far as affairs of government were concerned, Nicholson was charged with many arbitrary acts and wholesale assumption of power, especially to the exclusion of the council. Justices of the peace, it was said, he had privately appointed and sometimes blank commissions for that purpose were signed and sealed. The same course was followed in removals. One whole county court, they said, was turned out in that way. The same was true of the appointment and removal of sheriffs, county clerks, naval officers, the secretary, colonels and other military officers. Orders, proclamations and warrants were also issued without advice. Accounts of the revenue passed in the same way, Byrd, the deputy auditor, supporting this with a statement that the custom of audit by the council had been discontinued and he thereby had lost the public testimony to his integrity which he formerly had. Surveyors of land had been totally restrained in their work and rules prescribed for them by him alone. A permanent agent had also been appointed by the governor and paid out of the two shilling duty. Many things were put on record or forbidden entry by him alone. Records of courts were sometimes changed. He had mismanaged the affairs of the college. In council, both when in executive and legislative session, he sought to control and dictate affairs. He was impatient of debate, or monopolized it himself, and reproved or threatened members in a most abusive manner. Much also was made of a charge, inferred from Nicholson's plan to draft quotas from the militia for active service, that he intended to establish a standing army and with this destroy the liberties of the province.¹ Many of the things which were charged it was doubtless possible for a governor to do in those days, though that Nicholson did them on so large a scale as to make his government essentially arbitrary and autocratic is quite incredible.

As in the case of earlier governors, these charges, when presented in England, were ex parte and Nicholson had no agent effectively to represent him.² On the recommendation of the board of trade and under authority of an order in council the petition and the evidence supporting it were sent over to Virginia, that testimony might be taken on both sides without hindrance or coercion. The governor was required to permit this and, if he needed to visit England for his justification, he was to be allowed to do so. This case did not come to a hearing in England. Individuals were heard before the council in Virginia and affidavits were presented there, although in the presence of the governor and when he was presiding. He stated that all papers in support of his own case, as well as against it, should be free and open for the perusal of the council or even of others, but nothing like a hearing occurred either in Virginia or England. The strength of Nicholson's position appeared when the assembly met and he appealed to the house of burgesses.³ They supported him in a most loyal address, speaking of him personally in high terms and denying that they or their constituents had complaints to offer or suspected that he intended to introduce arbitrary power. In a number of letters to the board of trade Nicholson denied the charges in general, and some of them in particular, and claimed that they were the outgrowth of the exclusiveness of the council and its resolve to be the real governing body in Virginia. As Harrison, Ludwell and Blair were all related by marriage, his view also was that the opposition was chiefly confined to that group. They were able to carry only one half of the council with them. The view expressed by Harrison on the other side was, that the burgesses were so greedy for office and for treating while the sessions continued that the governor, who dispensed patronage, could easily control them and prevent the expression of any opinion hostile to himself.

¹ Perry, Hist. Colls. of Am. Colonial Church, Virginia, pp. 75-140; C. O. 5/314, O. P. Va. 1704; C. O. 5/1360, 1361, Entry Book, Va. 1702-1705; Minutes of Ex. Council, Va.

² John Throle was agent at the time, but he died before this affair was well over. Nathaniel Blakiston was then appointed agent.

³ Journal of Burgesses, Sess. of May, 1705. The exaggerated character of some of the statements of the councillors is illustrated by the charge of Beverley that Quarry had written to the board of trade stating that democratic principles prevailed so in Virginia that only the queen's discipline and an armed force could keep its people to their duty. This drew out an address of protest from the assembly to which the board denied that it had received any such letters from Quarry. C. O. 5/1316, Entry Book, Jan. 23, 1705/6; C. O. 5/1314, O. P., 1704.

Though Nicholson retained his hold on the burgesses, his administration in Virginia came to an end in 1705. A month before the lower house presented to him its favorable address the commission of Colonel Edward Nott to be governor had been drafted in England. An order was issued for the recall of Nicholson that he might give an account of the state of Virginia, but he was also informed by the secretary of state that his recall was not due to any information against him or any displeasure on the part of the queen, but to the fact that such a course, it was thought, would be for her service at that time. His many later and responsible appointments show that this statement was true. The fall session of the assembly, in 1705, brought to light, in the form of an election contest and statement of grievances, the fact that in King William county, where the Huguenots had settled, very strong dissatisfaction existed with the recent conduct of the councilors toward Nicholson.¹ Among their resolves were three to the effect that no one should submit grievances of the province to the crown without the consent of the burgesses, that no affidavits or memorials should hereafter be signed against governors, and that no thanks but rather a check should be given to those who had so done against Governor Nicholson. But so extreme did these views now seem to the burgesses that they ordered this statement of grievances publicly burned and compelled those who were chiefly responsible for it to make humble acknowledgement before the house and pay costs.

Not long before the close of Nicholson's administration William Byrd, the elder, died. He had been deputy auditor and receiver general of Virginia since he succeeded Nathaniel Bacon, Sr., in these offices in 1687.¹ For reasons of economy, in Bacon's time these two offices had been united in a single hand and had so continued during Byrd's incumbency. As receiver or treasurer Byrd had regularly accounted before the governor and council twice a year and his accounts had passed through Blathwayt's office to the treasury. The accounts under the item of quit rents showed a gain which went toward disproving the pleas of poverty with which the burgesses met every demand for expenditures toward general colonial defence. A report of Blathwayt in 1705 showed that the yield from this source in Virginia had been steadily increasing since 1684 and had now reached an annual revenue of more than £1800. The accumulation had been so large that for the first time a balance of some £3000 could be paid into the royal exchequer. So that Lord Treasurer Godolphin wrote to the governor emphasizing these facts and using them as an argument for greater activity with a view to securing a larger increase.² In this connection the need of much more complete rent rolls of the counties was enforced, especially in view of the fact that the number of them had now increased to thirty-five and boundaries had very much changed. Sheriffs and other officials were also to be encouraged to discover land from which rent was due but, because of imperfect surveys or none at all, it had not been paid. The death of Byrd, as well as the fact that his more famous son of the same name, applied for appointment to the two offices, helped still further to centre attention on Virginia finances. As the result of the general inquiry, the two offices were divided and the younger Byrd was appointed receiver general.³ These events accompanied the appointment of Edward Nott to the governorship of Virginia.

¹ Journal of Burgesses, Oct. and Nov. 1705.

Nott's administration lasted only a year, he dying in office in August, 1706. He was a capable official and found no difficulty in securing the harmonious cooperation of all departments of the government. On his death the president and council wrote, "He was a gentleman of a very happy temper to cure our divisions, and managed whatever was proposed for her Majesty's service in Council and Assembly with great satisfaction and success."¹ During the early months of his administration much attention was paid in the executive council to the straightening out of accounts and correcting the irregularities of officials. For a short time after the death of Byrd Nicholson had discharged the duties of the vacant offices in person and the council had some difficulty in effecting a settlement with him. In that connection further evidence appeared of his assuming to transact important financial business without consulting the council.² The practice of reading the minutes of the council at every session was now resumed, and when it came to meet in legislative session Nott absented himself most of the time. This indicated the spirit of the new administration. Plans for the better regulation of the granting of land and of quit rents received much attention. The lowering of the prices at which arms and ammunition, recently sent from England, were sold to purchasers was sought, and detailed orders as to their distribution among the counties were issued. As in Maryland, the right to appoint the county clerks was affirmed, objections of the board to a number of the revised laws were received and considered by the council in executive session.³ Relations were growing more complicated along the North Carolina border, with conflicting titles to land, all this making more imperative the necessity that the boundary should be settled. Questions relating to the Northern Neck also occasionally appeared. The condition of the vestries and the amount of support which was required by the clergy received much attention. The question of forts and towns was a perennial subject of discussion. The evidence concerning them and other questions of purely Virginia interest show that a good amount of executive business was done. The same was true of the two sessions of the assembly which met during the year of Nott's governorship.

¹ Blathwayt's Journal, Feb. 11, 1700/1.

² Ibid., April 2, 1705, and later entries.

³ Ibid., June 4, 8, 12, Oct. 29, 1705.

During the spring session of 1706 the burgesses sent up a bill for the levy of a duty on the importation of liquors and slaves, in which no exception was made of those which might come from the English realm. This directly violated instructions and furnished the council with an admirable chance to amend a money bill. Of this, though in courteous terms, it was not slow to avail itself, and the burgesses had to accept the amendment. In May, 1706, came the news of the capture of the island of St. Christopher by the French, and this aroused fears that it might be followed by a descent on the Virginia coast and the plundering of the tobacco fleet. At once there was great activity. The governor exhorted, the houses went into conference.¹ An embargo was laid, the coast watch was revived, and provision made for spreading alarms. Collectors and naval officers on the James and York rivers were called in to report what was necessary for their defence. After consultation with all parties, the governor concluded that Jamestown and West Point on York river were most capable of being fortified, while it was the general opinion that the shipping should be taken above these localities for protection. But fortunately the French did not appear and military activity soon abated.

¹ C. O. 5/1362, E. B., Pres. and Council to B. T., Aug. 29, 1706.

² Minutes of Ex. Council, Sept. 1705.

³ See Journal of Ex. Council for June 20, 1706.

The only other alarms from which Virginia seems to have suffered on account of foreign enemies during the war were occasioned by the appearance of French privateers off the coast in 1708 and 1709.² On the former occasion the vessel came from Martinique and captured a Liverpool ship and a sloop from the West Indies. The guardship "Garland" cruised about the capes, but did not meet the privateers. As it was under orders to convoy the fleet home, the "Garland" had to come up the river to prepare for the voyage. The privateer took advantage of this to venture within the capes, but captured nothing there.

In the spring of 1709 a general alarm was spread by the report that one Hendrix, who knew Virginia well, was coming as a privateer from Martinique. President Jennings had ammunition distributed and such cannon as they had planted along the bay to alarm the country. The "Garland" had not yet returned from a voyage to England, and therefore Virginia had to do the best she could to fit out a brigantine to cruise within the capes, communicate with vessels inward bound, and alarm the country. On occasion of every alarm like this, whether it proved real or not, people had to be withdrawn from their labor to defend the coast and slaves conveyed to places of safety until the danger was over. This was done to prevent them from being taken or running away. As this alarm occurred in the spring, it would have paralyzed agriculture during much of the planting season if some provision had not been made for the protection of the coast. But it occasioned expense, and the cost must for the time be met out of the stated revenue of the queen, with the hope that the next assembly would reimburse the charge. The privateer appeared, but was frightened away by the brigantine — which it was planned should carry ten guns and eighty men — and by the fact that it found Virginia on guard. At the Delaware and at Currituck, in North Carolina, considerable damage was done by the same vessel. During the winter of 1709/10 the "Garland" was lost off the Virginia coast and, as her successor did not arrive till some months later, it became necessary to fit out a sloop for temporary purposes of defence. A vessel which had arrived from New York was taken for the purpose. The continued presence of privateers on the coast made this necessary or else, as Jennings wrote, he would not have had the presumption to resort to the measure.¹ It was with an occasional experience of this kind that Virginia passed through all the later years of the war. In reality nothing more serious than that occurred to her during either of the two first colonial wars. Except for their indirect results, the colonies between the Delaware and South Carolina had no experience of these wars. Occasional alarms somewhat disturbed them and their trade relations were affected, but otherwise they were practically at peace. The burden of conflict in America rested on the colonies at the two ends of the arc, the West Indies and those more or less adjacent to the Gulf of St. Lawrence. The vast intermediate territory was not directly involved. This was due to geographical conditions and to the fact that operations at large were controlled by the exigencies of naval warfare.

¹ See Journals of Ex. Council and of Burgesses for May, 1706.

² C. O. 5/1362, Jennings to B. T. June 24, 1708, March 21, 1709.

¹ Ibid., Jennings to B. T., June, 1710.

As the only other military operations in which Virginia was involved prior to 1715 were then connected with the Tuscarora war in North Carolina, and this had no connection with the larger conflict, we can leave Virginia at this point and by this means gain the opportunity to treat the administration of Alexander Spotswood as a unit in itself.

CHAPTER XXII

MARYLAND DURING THE SECOND INTERCOLONIAL WAR. CLOSE OF THE PERIOD OF ROYAL GOVERNMENT

THAT part of Maryland history with which we are concerned in this chapter includes three administrations — those of Nathaniel Blakiston, (1699–1702), John Seymour (1704–1709), Edward Lloyd as president of the council (1709–1713). During the two years also which intervened between the retirement of Blakiston and the arrival of Seymour the affairs of the province were administered by the council and its president, Thomas Tench. When the period ended John Hart had been in office about a year.

During nearly one-half of this time the government of Maryland was in the hands of a president and council, they being natives of the province and not disposed to depart widely from lines of policy which had become established and traditional there. The rule of a president and council, as we have repeatedly seen, was regarded as temporary in its very nature and was expected to pass with as little change as possible. The fact that conditions were generally normal and peaceful in Maryland at that time, that it was nearly free from outside attacks and from internal discontent, caused the administrations of the royal governors as well to pass without serious conflicts or other dramatic events. With the transfer of Nicholson to Virginia, the irritation which had been provoked by the fits of passion and the overweening conceit to which he was now becoming a victim disappeared. Coode, whose real services in the Revolution were recognized, was allowed to return to Maryland, where he ended his days in obscurity.¹ His friends, freed from the danger of prosecution, resumed their places among the peaceful inhabitants of the province. Blakiston assumed an extremely conciliatory attitude, and the two years of his administration, coming as they did at the close of the brief period of peace between the two colonial wars, left Maryland in a state of almost perfect quiet and harmony.

¹ Md. Arch. XXV, 103.

The new governor was a London merchant of Northumbrian stock, one of whose uncles, Nehemiah Blakiston, we have found prominent in Maryland affairs both before and after the Revolution. He had died there in 1693. The nephew had already served as lieutenant governor of Montserrat and expected that the same harmonious relations would attend him in Maryland as in his island colony.¹ At the time of his appointment piracy was at its height and the Scotch experiment at Darien was in progress. The admiralty courts were in process of establishment and Robert Quarry was beginning his career as judge of admiralty at Philadelphia. William Penn was returning for his second visit to his province, which brought Markham's administration to an end and checked in some respects the activities of pirates and illegal traders in that region. The earl of Bellomont was vigorously attacking the same evils in New York. Nicholson, following out his characteristic line of activity, planned a meeting between himself, Blakiston and Bellomont at Philadelphia, where Penn could be present,² a plan which was never executed. The settled shores of Maryland, along the upper Chesapeake, were secluded, but they caught glimpses of pirates fresh from Madagascar under the lead of Turner, a companion of Giles Shelley, who had landed off Cape Henlopen. Scotch traders appeared in Maryland as elsewhere.³ Under the customary orders from England, Maryland officials dealt with these intruders as they were able. A small sixth rate was stationed in the Chesapeake to serve more as an advice boat for communication with Virginia than as a restraint against pirates and illegal traders.⁴ Later it was Blakiston's opinion that a sloop which could carry only six or eight men and was small enough to run into the creeks and coves would be more useful for service on the upper Chesapeake than were larger vessels, and it would be much less expensive.⁵

¹ Md. Arch. XXII, 288.

³ Md. Arch. XXV, 73, 77.

² Cal. St. P. Col., 1699, p. 239.

⁴ Cal. St. P. Col., 1700, pp. 55, 288.

⁵ C. O. 5/715, Memorial from Blakiston to Lord High Admiral, Nov. 19, 1702. Morriss, Colonial Trade of Maryland, 1689-1715. J. H. U. Studies, XXXII.

The tobacco industry was passing through another serious crisis at this time, a crisis which affected Virginia as well as Maryland and the entire belt of colonies which were devoted to the production of this staple. As had been true many times during the previous century, over-production with its accompaniment of low prices was a fundamental difficulty. But, notwithstanding the evidence of the market, the tobacco planters could not be diverted to any serious extent from the industry to which they had so attached themselves at the time Virginia and Maryland were first settled. The production of the weed was large in the West Indies. The Dutch were committing themselves extensively to the industry. The prohibition of the use of tobacco in Russia had been removed and under the lead of Peter the Great its manufacture there was increasing, with possibilities arising from the share which British merchants were taking in this enterprise that caused anxiety to the board of trade and other officials.¹ Still the best quality of tobacco came from Spain, and as between Virginia and Maryland, the older colony had the advantage. The use of the weed was rapidly spreading, but in the race between the smokers and chewers on the one side and the planters on the other the persistence of low prices indicated that there was no likelihood of demand overtaking supply. Though the British government at the start had been opposed to the industry and doubts concerning its utility still lingered, officials and legislators had long since yielded to the temptation offered by large revenue and with them the fiscal motive had supplanted every other. Therefore tobacco, notwithstanding the low form of agriculture to which it gave rise and the unfortunate effects which it had on society in general, had become a favorite colonial product with all the nations, and with the British in particular had long since taken its place among their leading staples, the most valuable which was produced upon the American continent. In the mercantilist's hierarchy Virginia held the highest seat because she was the leading producer of tobacco. Her loyalty rested upon that as a broad and sufficient basis and official pressure cooperated with social inertia to keep her in the straight and narrow path of mercantilist orthodoxy. Like the production of naval stores, the raising of tobacco, in the colonies concerned, was encouraged as a means of diverting the people from manufacturing.

¹ See material in C. O. 5/1361.

But before 1690 over-production,¹ with the prevailing low prices, had proven a serious drawback, as the tobacco cutting riots and other crude efforts to find a remedy had shown. After the beginning of the colonial wars, exclusion from foreign markets, embargoes, irregularity in the arrivals and sailings of the tobacco fleets added to the difficulties of the situation. These became more serious in the second than in the first war, because Spain was now an enemy of Great Britain. In 1706, and again in 1707, the board of trade, in a memorial to the queen, stated that the tobacco trade of England was under great discouragements in its exports to Muscovy, Sweden, Denmark, France and Spain, those countries being chiefly supplied with tobacco of foreign growth, so that it was found that tobacco of British origin would no longer be used in those countries. Within a decade the output in the provinces along the lower Rhine, where tobacco was chiefly raised, had increased nearly threefold, and had reached an annual production of 27,000,000 pounds. In the cities of the Netherlands the manufacturing and export of tobacco was being carried on upon a large scale, and the board reported that the Dutch by the cheapness of their product had ousted Virginia tobacco from the markets of northern Europe. Certain minor remedies, such as allowing neutral ships to carry British tobacco to France, were suggested to relieve the situation while the war lasted. But John Hinton, a large manufacturer and dealer, urged that a drawback of the entire duty be allowed on the export of manufactured tobacco from England and that perplexing oaths at the custom houses be done away with in order to facilitate exportation.² In 1714 the board of trade repeated its statements of seven years before and declared that Virginia and Maryland were in a miserable condition, occasioned by the low price of tobacco, due to the great quantity and cheapness of the European product and to the high rates of duty levied on it in Great Britain.¹ Also, when the tobacco fleets were delayed or for any reason brought inadequate cargoes of manufactured goods, the tobacco colonies suffered from a dearth of these and that tempted them to resort to manufacturing, especially of clothing, and also in some cases to removals into other colonies where the economic system was different. In 1715, because of the decrease of revenue in Virginia due to the decay in the tobacco trade, the board advised that the quit rents be no longer drawn into the exchequer in England, as had been the custom during the past few years, but that they be left in the province and used to meet its expenditures. These statements, supported as they were by frequent wails from the colony and from merchants and leading to the passage of an act by parliament in 1713 to relieve some of the conditions of importation, show that the tobacco industry of that period was not prosperous and that Virginia and Maryland were suffering because of it.

¹ Since the early days of the colonies the average crop per colonist had decreased about one-half, but the increase in population had resulted in a much larger gross production.

² C. O. 5/1362, July 1, 1707; Jan. 12, 1709.

The planters marketed their crop either by sending it to commission merchants in England, or by selling it in the colony to factors or agents of British merchants or to ship captains.² Under the former method the planter had to trust the merchant to sell the tobacco at a price which would pay the freight, duties and commission and yield a profit to the planter. The return was usually made in European goods. Under this method the planter bore the risks of transit and also of sale at a loss and of loss through bad debts in England. By the second method these were avoided, but with them the chance of a rise in price in the British market. The merchants generally preferred the former method and those of London followed it; so it was much more difficult for planters to sell their crops outright at their wharves. But in any case, because of the low prices, the profits of the planter were small and they are said to have been generally in debt to the merchants with whom they dealt, sometimes losing their estates as the result of this. With the lapse of time and the growth of demand for a cheaper quality of tobacco, ¹ C. O. 5/1364, p. 33 et seq.; C. O. 5/1316, p. 12. The price of tobacco during three years ranged about two pence per pound.

² Morris, Colonial Trade of Maryland, J. H. U. Studies, XXXII.

the character of the crop tended to deteriorate. Stalks were packed with leaves and added their part to the weight on which customs were collected. Much trash was sent and the shipping of tobacco in bulk facilitated this practice. The conditions of marketing also affected the industry as a whole and the social conditions to which it gave rise, but they did not turn any appreciable number to the production of cereals or other commodities for which a favored market did not exist in Great Britain.

What has been said about tobacco in Virginia, is true in general in the case of Maryland. The two colonies had committed themselves equally to this form of industry; but the quality of the Maryland crop was always considered slightly inferior to that of Virginia. The sweet-scented variety raised in Virginia was superior to any which the sister colony produced. The cessation of the war relieved the tobacco trade to an extent in Maryland, as it did elsewhere. But the people in general were poor. When Blakiston was appointed, he was intrusted with suits against a number of Marylanders who had been sureties on forfeited navigation bonds, but the attorney general of the province had certified that not a thousand pounds could be recovered from all of them. The following year the lower house petitioned that further prosecutions be suspended, as the accused must perish in jail through lack of means to pay the judgments against them, and besides in most cases there was no intention of fraud at the beginning.¹ During the war some who continued planting had been compelled to sell part of their land and servants to save the rest,² while others resorted more to the manufacture of woolen, cotton, linen, leather and the like for the supply of family and local needs. The debtor class was very numerous and is much in evidence, and out of the general situation arose complaints that not a few were migrating to Pennsylvania and North Carolina.

In replying to a proposal for increased expenditure in 1702 the assembly stated that Maryland had no means of raising money except by imposing duties on exports and imports, about 95% being raised by duties on tobacco. To raise money by a direct tax on the inhabitants was utterly impracticable, for the greater part had not five shillings by them nor any means for raising it, because there was very little money in the province and that in the form of a base coinage which did not circulate in the other colonies. In 1704 Governor Seymour wrote, "Maryland has at present no prospect of increasing its trade and navigation by tillage, the planters being so bent on their crops of tobacco that they scarcely make grain to eat, but are forced to be supplied from Pennsylvania." A law which had just been passed for imposing an export duty on Maryland products,¹ he said, would be of little use, as very few furs or skins were being exported and for seven years past not a barrel of beef or pork had been sent out of the province, but supplies of this nature had been purchased from Pennsylvania and other colonies. Though during the royal period Maryland raised an adequate supply of cattle and hogs and supplied her own demand for corn, she exported no foodstuffs.²

¹ Cal. St. P. Col., 1697-1698, p. 482; Md. Arch. XXII, 428; Morriss, op. cit., 27, 40.

² C. O. 5/716. The Present State of the Tobacco Plantations in America (unsigned), recd. Dec. 16, 1708.

After the second war began, the tobacco industry was further depressed by embargoes, added perils of the ocean and consequent irregularity in the supply of shipping for carrying the product to market. Maryland merchants were dependent on the dates set for the sailing of the fleets from Virginia, and sometimes received incorrect notices. On one occasion the commodore sent notice that he would sail in twenty days, but really did not sail for nearly two months. Such delays injured the cargos and were a source of great inconvenience. Though, because of the small returns from tobacco for years past, many of the planters had found their servants and slaves burdensome, yet servants and slaves were being steadily imported at the rate in each case of something like 600 a year.³ Seymour wrote in 1706 that Charles Carroll, Baltimore's agent, had brought in more than 200 Irish Catholics, to whom assurances of land had been given, when their terms of service should have expired. This the governor regarded as a growing evil.¹ The cry was still raised that, owing to poverty, people were moving away. North Carolina had invited people to settle there under a promise of exemption for five years from the payment of their debts, and Pennsylvania by raising the value of their coin beyond proclamation rates. Seymour proposed to pass a bankruptcy law as a help for people in debt and appealed to the home government for other measures of relief.²

¹ C. O. 5/715. From comments of Seymour on Md. acts, recd. Oct. 1705.

² Morris, 16-21.

³ Morris, 77 et seq.; C. O. 5/716. Seymour to Board, recd. June, 1706.

During the administration of Lloyd and the council, and at close of the war, the same note was sounded. The tobacco market was poor. What little manufacturing was done in Maryland, was necessitated by the scarcity of imported goods. Trade with the West Indies was small. In April, 1713, the president and council implored the board of trade to have consideration for the "poor province," reduced to most distressed circumstances by the extremely low price of Orinoco tobacco.³ The inhabitants had been forced to spin the little wool their flocks afforded and some small quantities of flax for necessary clothing. A similar representation was sent by the entire legislature later in the year. Some turned also to the raising of grain and cattle, for the surplus of which a ready market was found in the West Indies.

A minor difficulty connected with the trade arose from the tendency, as freight was estimated by the cask or hogshead, to steadily increase their size. The size which became common in Maryland exceeded that of the Virginia hogsheads — which were the model — by two inches in the diameter, though their lengths were the same. This the Marylanders sought to justify by the argument that the Virginia brand of tobacco was heavier than theirs. But even that difference made packing difficult on board the ships which carried the product to England, and an agitation was kept up by the British merchants until, in 1711, the assembly yielded and passed an act requiring conformity with the size of Virginia casks.⁴

¹ Seymour to Bd., Nov. 18, 1708; ibid., Pres. & C. to Bd., Nov. 4, 1710.

² C. O. 5/716, Seymour to Board of Trade, June 23, 1708.

³ C. O. 5/717, Lloyd to Board, July 15, 1712; ibid., Apr. 16, 1713; ibid., rec'd, Jan. 13, 1713/14; Md. Arch. XXIX, 218, 282.

⁴ Md. Arch. XXV, 246; XXVII, 215; XXIX, 74; C. O. 5/716. Memorial from Merchants, etc., rec'd Mar. 16, 1707/8; ibid., Lloyd to Board, Jan. 25, 1711/12.

The ever recurring question of ports and towns, which was so closely connected with the tobacco industry, was also prominent during Seymour's administration. He was strongly in favor of the restriction of the shipping of tobacco and the landing of imported goods to five staple towns, Annapolis, Oxford, Somerset, Patuxent and St. Mary's. To the board of trade he enlarged upon the advantages which would come through this arrangement to all parties concerned, and urged that the plan be put in operation under an act of parliament or by orders from the crown.¹ Seymour was ordered, instead, to recommend that the assembly should pass an act for the purpose desired. Seymour immediately sent to Virginia for information as to its laws and regulations on the subject, which were to be laid before the Maryland assembly. In April, 1706, a long and complicated act was passed by the assembly, modelled apparently on those which had been passed before. It made nearly every important exporter's wharf a port, contained detailed provisions for the settlement of towns which could never exist except upon paper, while the provisions for exclusive trading there related to imports and not to exports. Two supplementary acts followed, and though the governor expressed gratification at what the assembly had done, it is clear that under its enactments the tobacco trade would have remained practically as unregulated as it had previously been.²

As soon as these measures reached England, the merchants objected that they required all Great Britain to keep store with their goods in certain places called towns, which at present were without buildings or inhabitants, and allowed the people of Maryland to dispose of their products in any part of the province. Another requirement of this legislation, chiefly directed, it is probable, against the competition of Pennsylvania, was the provision that all British products, being once imported could not be exported out of Maryland; they must be sold there or perish. Because of these objections the three acts were disallowed, late in 1709.¹ In the following August the merchants, in a communication to the board of trade, alleged that they had suffered much from the above-mentioned laws before their repeal, and asked that the governor of Maryland be instructed not to assent to any act concerning navigation and commerce unless a sufficient time was allowed before it went into effect for them to be informed of its provisions. An instruction to this effect was given to Governor Hart and he urged the assembly to take up the matter again because of the advantages to trade which seemed obvious to him in the creation of a number of port towns.²

¹ C. O. 5/715, Lowndes and Seymour to Board, Nov. 2, 1705; ibid., rec'd. June 12.

² C. O. 5/716, Seymour to the Board, Aug. 21, 1706; Md. Arch. XXVI, p. 636 et seq.; XXVII, 159, 346.

As had been stated by the authors of "The Present State of Virginia," another very inconvenient effect of the too exclusive devotion of the tobacco colonies to their favorite product was this, that they were compelled to use it as a substitute for money. But efforts from time to time were made to escape from this and to secure a supply of coin. In 1694 and again the next year bills were introduced into the lower house, the object of which was to promote the use of money, especially in the payment of duties and officers' fees.³ In 1701 a bill passed the lower house to encourage the importation of coin and the use of it in paying public levies; but the governor and council thought the change would introduce such complications in adjusting payments as to cause confusion and, for one thing, make it very difficult to execute the provision in the church act for the payment of the clergy. It was also seen to be necessary, if coin was to be used, to equalize its value in exchange with that of neighboring colonies, a thing which could not be done without permission from the crown. For this reason the governor declined to approve the bill until he heard from the board of trade.⁴ In his letter to the board Blakiston stated, at the request of the assembly, that coin in Maryland consisted of a few pieces

¹ Ibid., Memorial from merchants, rec'd. Sept. 23, 1709; C. O. 5/717. Order in council, Dec. 15, 1709.

² C. O. 5/717. Memorial of merchants, rec'd. Aug. 12, 1710; Md. Arch. XXIX, 394, 469. It is interesting to note that, as early as 1701, a joint committee of the houses was appointed to consider means for the partial substitution of money for tobacco as the medium in which to pay taxes. Md. Arch. XXIV, 172.

³ Md. Arch. XIX, 47, 252.

⁴ Md. Arch. XXIV, 149. C. O. 5/715. Blakiston to Board, May 25, 1701.

of eight and Lyon dollars. The latter passed in Maryland for 4s. 6d. but among their neighbors the pieces of eight passed for 5s. and the Lyon dollars in Pennsylvania at 6s. and in New York at a little less. The result was that coin steadily passed out of Maryland to the colonies where it was more highly valued. The assembly therefore desired permission to rate their dollars at 5s. as in Virginia, since the presence of so little money in Maryland hindered business of all kinds, and public meetings and courts, since persons could not be accommodated without it.

One clause in an act of 1704 for the direction of sheriffs permitted the payment of levies in money in lieu of tobacco rated at 1d. per pound. This was to continue in force for three years. In commenting on this act Seymour expressed the hope that it would not be construed as tending to lessen the planting of tobacco, since without the law money could be used for the purchase of tobacco with which to pay levies, fees and the like. It was also claimed that the act would better enable sheriffs to collect from poor people who raised no tobacco. Another act of the same session for the encouragement of trade with the West Indies had, as one of its objects, the preventing of Pennsylvania drawing off the little coin which was current in Maryland. But no relief came, and in 1706 the governor, council and assembly addressed the queen and suggested as a remedy for the total lack of coin from which they suffered that she grant them a fractional coinage in specie—three-penny and six-penny pieces—to the amount of £700 st.—the same to be repaid and to be current only in Maryland.¹

In 1704 another and related feature of the economic policy of Maryland appeared in the form of an act,² which was periodically revived in later years, prohibiting the importation from Pennsylvania or the Lower Counties of any bread-stuffs, beer, malt or horses, these being the staple exports of that province. One motive of this legislation, which was very natural in the colonies as they were then situated, was to encourage the production of grain in Maryland and an export trade in it similar to that which flourished to the northward.

¹ Ibid., XXVI, 551.

² Md. Arch. XXVI, 314; XXVII, 574; XXIX, 238, 255.

But the tobacco industry was too strongly entrenched to permit of success in these efforts. Pennsylvanians also, by importing their grain, "picked up the ready money and Bills of Exchange by which and other like Practices they have heretofore sucked the very marrow of the Province," declared the Maryland council on one occasion. These expressions and the adoption of this policy furnished additional proof of the disadvantage under which the tobacco régime placed Maryland.

As has been stated, the attitude assumed by Blakiston toward the province and its assembly was one of the utmost kindness and conciliation. To his first assembly, after he had been six months in Maryland, he said that his acts should give proof of his resolve to maintain the interest of the province and to secure for its people the fullest measure of justice they could hope or desire. To him it was like "a fair sheet of paper," for he came not with prejudice toward any person. Notwithstanding the evidences of agricultural distress, he affirmed the real identity of interests between the province and Great Britain; and well might this appear to be true in a colony politically so peaceful as Maryland was at that time. At the beginning of the next session of this assembly the governor expressed the greatest satisfaction with the perfect accord which had existed hitherto and left the houses to proceed on their usual course without dictation on his part. Though an election was held toward the close of his administration, it was not owing to any dissatisfaction on either side.¹

A number of his instructions which Blakiston, as was usual, laid before the assembly, were calmly ignored by it as inapplicable to the conditions of the province, physical and otherwise. Among these was the requirement that a survey should be made of the landing places on the rivers and harbors and forts erected there. The assembly regarded this as futile for the reasons which we have already found to have largely defeated similar efforts at Point Comfort in Virginia.² Though the period of peace was to be short, and toward its close came warnings from Bellomont of activity among the Indians on the northern frontier, the assembly remained inactive. A few rangers were sent out on occasion. Blakiston found such arms as remained lodged with the county authorities,¹ which probably meant that they were inaccessible and out of repair. Though an elaborate militia act was passed in 1699, it was framed on the old lines and nothing had been accomplished toward the improvement of the force.² In May, 1701, the lower house even voted to disband the few rangers which were out and not to continue a committee on Indian affairs. The total number then liable to military service in Maryland was somewhat in excess of five thousand.³

¹ Md. Arch. XXIV, 8.

² Ibid., XXII, 287, 295, 380.

Disputes over the governor's support did not arise, because the additional appropriation of three pence per hogshead on the export of tobacco which had been given to Nicholson was continued. In the making and expenditure of appropriations, too, the houses shared and there were no disputes between them. In May, 1700, and again in 1701, a joint committee of the two houses was intrusted with the power to assess the public levy already voted, to allow a specified additional amount if it seemed necessary,⁴ and to apportion and pay out sums which appeared to be due to parties named in the journal of the committee of accounts. The authority to draw and expend money on an emergency during a recess of the assembly had been previously granted to the council with a committee of the lower house, and the treasurer was ordered to honor their drafts.⁵ This continued to be the usage after the beginning of the next war.

At the end of two years Blakiston's health broke down and he returned to England. But his connection with Maryland was not wholly severed. There had been complaint that this province had not kept an agent near the court, and at his own suggestion Blakiston was appointed to this office.⁶

¹ Ibid., XIX, 586; XX, 145, 151; C. O. 5/715, Blakiston to Board, May 25, 1701. Account of arms read, Dec. 8, 1701.

² Ibid., XXII, 562; XXIV, 12, 14, 190; XXV, 57, 76.

³ C. O. 5/716, Seymour to Board of Trade, June 23, 1708.

⁴ Ibid., XXIX, 107, 204; XXVI, 350. The journal of the committee of accounts is on pp. 111-124 of vol. XXIV.

⁵ Ibid., XXII, 452 et seq.; XXIV, 322.

⁶ Ibid., 260-261, 316, 393, 395. C. O. 5/715, Blakiston to Board of Trade, Sept. 17, 1702; Memorial of Blakiston rec'd. Aug. 23, 1704. These last are instances of Blakiston's activity as agent.

It was while he was serving in this capacity that Seymour was appointed to the governorship and of him Blakiston sent a favorable account.

Seymour, like at least some of his name in England, was an assertive and self-important man. He was also a strong supporter of the Church, and for these reasons certain features of Nicholson's administration were bound to recur. The war had been in progress in the north for some time when he arrived in Maryland. These facts suggest three important characteristics of his administration, in all of which it differed from the one which preceded. Under Seymour there was considerable legislation—some of it relating to the courts—and the laws were revised. The comments which he made when transmitting these to England show that he must have had some knowledge of the law. As we have seen, the claim of Sir Thomas Lawrence was again brought to the front, while the aggressive attitude of the governor toward Catholics gave new life to charges against the proprietary régime and to controversies with Lord Baltimore over land and revenue. It was just after Seymour's arrival that the final change was made in the act for the establishment of the Church, and about its interests and protection against fancied dangers from Catholics centered not a little of Seymour's activity. It was in harmony with the tendencies of Anne's reign, as reflected in many of the colonies, that this should be so.

The case of Sir Thomas Lawrence, of which we have already heard so much, was revived early in this administration and was kept pretty continuously in view until 1712 or later. The occasion of this was the passage in 1704 of an act diverting the profits which arose from the licensing of ordinaries to the province treasury. This set Lawrence petitioning again for the restoration of what he claimed as his rights.¹ In 1707 an opinion was rendered by the attorney general, Sir Simon Harcourt, favorable to the claim of Lawrence. The act in question, he thought, should be disallowed and a permanent act passed, in the place of the temporary ones which had existed since 1693, vesting the fees in question in her majesty's secretary. Incidentally also he called attention to the fact that Sir Thomas' patent had expired with the death of the late king and had not been renewed; he was therefore serving illegally, as probably were many other officials in the colonies, and this defect should be remedied. An order in council was issued in accordance with that part of the opinion which related to the permanent disposal of profits from the licenses.¹

¹ C. O. 5/715; Memorials of Lawrence to Board, rec'd. Nov. 30, 1705, Jan. 18, 1705/6, May 8, 1707.

But, as Seymour wrote, Sir Thomas was the last person whom the assembly seemed willing to oblige. An ordinance was passed by the two houses, so as to avoid the necessity of submitting it to the crown, forbidding ordinaries to be kept or liquor to be sold without license from the county justices. This, of course, provoked the controversy, and in it Bladen, the clerk of the council, and others became involved. The governor was charged by Sir Thomas with grave injustice toward him and with sacrificing the prerogative. The board of trade condemned the ordinance by which the will of the home government in reference to the act of 1704 was thwarted, but the most that the crown would do was to instruct the next governor to use his best efforts to secure the passage of a permanent law vesting the profits of the licenses in question in the secretary and making him a proper grant in lieu of the profits which he had lost since 1704. But this was never done by the assembly, and Sir Thomas Lawrence died with his claims unsatisfied.¹ The proposal of the lower house to appoint an agent was held up by the council because of the disagreement of the houses over these claims.

The claims of Lawrence also brought him into controversy, as we have seen, with the agents of Lord Baltimore over the custody of land patents and other similar records and the fees which were connected therewith.² Charles ¹ C. O. 5/716; Opinion of attorney general, rec'd. Aug. 5, 1707; O. in C. Jan. 15, 1707/8; Md. Arch. XXV, 247; Seymour to Board, Jan. 10, 1708/9; Memorial of Lawrence to Board rec'd. Feb. 24, 1709/10; O. in C. Mar. 30, 1710.

² Md. Arch. XXIX, 204, 222, 233, 236, 253, 260, 267, 284, 286, 305, 323, 326; C. O. 5/717, Address from House of Delegates, rec'd. by Board, Jan. 29, 1713/14.

³ Md. Arch. XXV, 130, 137, 138.

Carroll, who gradually rose to the place of proprietary agent held by Darnall, was now involved in these disputes. They were inherited from the previous administrations and never reached a settlement. The relations between the proprietor and the government of the crown in Maryland were still being illustrated by criticisms which were directed by Lord Baltimore, in his communications to the board of trade, against important acts relating to grants and bounds of land, escheats, the qualification of surveyors, arrears of rent, debts and their collection. Upon acts relating to all these matters the proprietor, during the period which we are now considering, expressed opinions which were dictated by his own interests.¹ In provinces which were situated like Maryland such representations bore a part in all that related especially to the confirmation or rejection of laws. In his comments upon an act of 1699 for rectifying the indefinite bounds which at first had been assigned to land grants, Lord Baltimore emphasized the fact in many ways that he or his conditions of plantation or the rights of his tenants and officials were being infringed. He plead in detail earlier precedents and the claims of the proprietor. In the case of another act which declared bonds void unless they were renewed or put in suit within five years of the contraction of the debt, he complained that it would cause many suits and would greatly injure himself, as well as others, because he had been lenient with many of his debtors. Against an act of 1707, which required that Baltimore's surveyors should qualify themselves as did royal officials, he argued that it was as if all the noblemen's stewards in England should be obliged to take the oaths required of magistrates, which would be absurd. The reply of the assembly to this and other arguments was that for many years the proprietor's conditions of plantation had not been published or his rates of fees published, and abuses were complained of. To this charge Baltimore replied with more or less specific denials. The attitude of the law officers toward his claims was generally fair, and the board of trade sometimes sent his statements concerning them to the council and assembly of Maryland for consideration and the remedy of any injustice.

¹ C. O. 5/715, Memorials rec'd. Jan. 11, 1712/3, Apr. 19, 1703; C. O. 5/716, Memorial rec'd. Feb. 20, 1707/8; report of solicitor gen. in same, rec'd. June 7, 1708, C. O. 5/717; Baltimore to Popple, July 7, 1710; Md. Arch. XIX, 209; XXII, 481; XXVI, 143, 574; XXVII, 154, 175.

Closely involved with the claims of the Calvert family, until near the close of this period, as well as with the policy of the supporters of the established Church, were the activities of the Catholics in Maryland. The strenuous Anglicanism of Seymour made him very sensitive to any stirrings on their part. The largest group of Catholics lived in St. Mary's county, but they were scattered through several other counties and according to a census of 1708 numbered a little less than three thousand.¹ Among them were relatives and agents of the proprietor, many of whom had fine estates. Priests, some of the Jesuit order, were quietly active among them. The importation of Irish Catholic servants, which occurred to some extent, was viewed with great suspicion by the Maryland government.

In August, 1704, the attorney general reported that two priests, apparently Jesuits, had been presented before the county court of St. Mary's, one for consecrating a chapel and the other for saying mass.² They were brought before the governor and council during the next session of the assembly. Charles Carroll appeared as their counsel, but it was decided that they should have none. The priests addressed the governor with great politeness and submission, but were abruptly told that, this being their first offence, they should be let off with a severe reprimand, but must on another appearance expect the utmost severity of the law. Seymour administered the reprimand in the most brutal and insulting manner, closing with the statement, "I am an English Protestant and can never equivocate." To the board of trade he wrote that he was uncertain how far the penal statutes of England which did not mention the dominions extended to them; but though he asked for further orders he took his instructions to mean Catholics were expressly excluded from toleration. He regarded Catholics as formidable in Maryland because of their close connection with the proprietor and of the control which they thereby had over land. Votes favorable to them were few in the assembly, because those who cast them were likely to suffer in grants of land. The Quakers Seymour regarded with almost as great aversion as he did the Catholics and often referred to their general uselessness if not their secret Jacobitism.

¹ Md. Arch. XXV, 258.

² Md. Arch. XXV, 178; XXVI, 44; C. O. 5/715, Seymour to Board, Sept. 29, 1704, Lawrence to Board, Oct. 25, 1703.

In September, 1704, an act was passed forbidding Catholic priests, on penalty of fine, to baptize children or celebrate mass, and threatening them with transportation to England for punishment if they should attempt the teaching of youth.¹ But before the end of the year, in response to a memorial from Catholics, this enactment was qualified by a provision that, for the exercising of their function in private Catholic families, priests should not be prosecuted until eighteen months after the publication of the law had passed or until the pleasure of the crown had been declared. In the course of the following year the attorney general declared in an opinion² that, though it was doubtful if the persecuting statutes of Elizabeth extended to colonies which had been acquired since her time, there was no doubt but that any bishop or priest, for saying mass or performing other service anywhere in the realm or dominions, could be adjudged to perpetual imprisonment. As to whether priests could be expelled from a colony, he thought that it could be done if they were aliens, but not if they were natural born subjects.

The first of these acts was regarded by the board of trade and the bishop of London as unduly severe, that it might be used to prevent even private Catholic services and so might in part depopulate the colony. Since the object of legislation was simply to restrain exorbitant practices, they advised that, as the second act was sufficiently mild, it be made permanent, and this was done in 1707.³ Until the close of his administration Governor Seymour was suspicious of Catholic intrigues, and counted the presence of Catholics in the province as among the things which made government there uneasy.¹ At the time, too, of the accession of the Hanoverians in England there were fears of activity on behalf of the Stuarts. Some rumors were investigated by Governor Hart and his council and a proclamation to warn offenders and quiet the popular mind was issued, but the transition in Maryland was passed without disturbance. The acceptance of the Anglican faith by the proprietor and his family, which was the condition of his restoration to rights of government in Maryland was a blow to the Catholics and put an end to all fears of possible political ascendancy for them.

¹ Md. Arch. XXVI, 340, 431.

² C. O. 5/715, report rec'd. Oct. 23, 1705.

³ Acts of P. C. Col. II, 498; Md. Arch. XXVII, 146.

During Seymour's term of office and some time afterwards the judicial system of the province was the subject of considerable discussion.² The jurisdiction of the provincial court, as related to that of the county courts, was one of the subjects involved. In Maryland, as elsewhere, this question was a phase of the conflict, so to speak, between local interests and convenience and the demand for uniform and regular administration from a centre. It had appeared in the development of the judicial system of mediaeval England and was reflected in many, if not all, of the colonies. In December, 1708, the lower house reported it to the governor as a grievance that the county courts could not finally determine any action which involved more than 10,000 pounds of tobacco or £50 sterling. This was the cause of many suits being brought to the provincial court which, for half the cost and in much less time, might be heard and finally adjudged in the county courts. The governor was asked to issue new commissions empowering the county justices to hear and determine all actions, of what nature soever, except titles to land and criminal cases extending to life or member. The upper house, knowing that the desire of the province for an extension of the jurisdiction of the county courts was strong, agreed to the issue of new commissions, but also desired that the burghesses, or delegates, as they were now called, would prepare a bill for reducing the number of sessions of the county courts, as that would bring relief to the county budgets. But nothing further was then done, and the same subject appeared again among the grievances a year later. A conference committee then reported that the broad jurisdiction of the provincial court was a serious grievance, but as they were thus under the government of President Lloyd and the council the best course would be to enlarge the commissions of the county justices and make application to the next governor for a settlement of the question.¹

¹ Md. Arch. XXV, 327-336.

² For a comprehensive account of the courts of Maryland in 1701, see C. O. 5/715. Scheme, etc., rec'd. Apr. 9. 1701.

In the autumn of 1710 the lower house sent up a bill to prevent a multiplicity of actions in the provincial court. The upper house expressed sympathy with its object, but again they referred to the instruction that no laws should be passed on new subjects during the absence of a governor. The lower house, however, pressed the matter and the council yielded. A temporary act was passed requiring that suits in which the debt or damages involved did not exceed £20 st. or 5000 pounds of tobacco must be tried in the county where the debtor resided. In explaining their action to the board of trade the president and council stated that they were unwilling to concur with the house but, being aware of the deplorable circumstances of very many inhabitants of Maryland who were daily arrested and brought from the remotest parts to the provincial court, they were prevailed on to pass the bill to continue in force for two years. They could never have done it if they had not thought this law of the greatest importance to relieve the hardships of people in Maryland and prevent their removal, for they knew how it would be misrepresented before the board of trade. Creditors, they thought, would find speedy remedy in the county courts, though they would have to take a little more pains in soliciting their suits there, and yet the cost would not be so great. In 1712 the act was continued till the end of the first session after the arrival of the governor. At the first session under Governor Hart it was reenacted for three years longer.²

Among the grievances of 1712 a prominent place was held by the charge that fees taken by the provincial court were very heavy as was the cost of attendance on its sessions. A committee of the houses conferred and there was some legislation.¹ It was said at the time that losses and the decay of trade during the war had led some to skulk in the woods and ride armed to resist the officers of justice, a peril to public order which it was now hoped would abate.

¹ Md. Arch. XXVII, 296, 300, 426, 431.

² Md. Arch. XXVII, 544, 551, 555, 559; XXIX, 439; C. O. 5/717. President and Council to Board of Trade, Nov. 4, 1710.

At the same time there was much complaint of the sheriffs, that in issuing certain writs and attachments they sold the properties which came into their hands at much less than their appraised values to the great loss of both debtors and creditors.² In 1713 an act was passed forbidding such practices. The following year a bill was also passed further limiting the fees of sheriffs. In July, 1714, in the report of the committee of the lower house on grievances, appeared the charge that, as the result of the sale of the office of sheriff to the highest bidders, incompetent men had come to hold it, to the great loss of the public. It was urged that the county justices should nominate two or three candidates, from whom the governor and council should appoint.

During Seymour's administration in particular another effort was made better to connect central and local justice in the province, and in this the governor was specially interested. As early as 1694, under the advice of attorneys, the governor and council had proposed to the lower house, that a number of itinerant justices of the provincial court be appointed for each shore and that they ride the circuits like justices of assize in England. The matter was put off. In 1701 a bill for the appointment of itinerant justices was prepared and the subject was referred to the committee on laws. A debate was had on the subject, after which a motion to reject was carried. In July, 1705, Seymour wrote to the board of trade complaining of irregularities of the provincial court and stating that four itinerant justices, properly selected, would do the business better and save expense. In March, 1707, the governor informed the assembly that he had received the queen's instructions to appoint four itinerant justices and enlarged upon the advantages which would follow therefrom. An attempt was then made to pass an act constituting the office and defining its duties, but it failed. The governor a few months later, under instructions from the board of trade and with the assent of the council, had reduced the number of judges of the provincial court from twelve or thirteen to four, and these held four terms yearly and went the eastern and western circuits twice yearly.¹

¹ Md. Arch. XXIX, 90, 93-100, 101, 102.

² Ibid., 111-117, 119, 149, 255, 342, 392, 393, 445.

This, in the opinion of Seymour, met with general satisfaction, except in the case of some of the county justices who thought their dignity lessened thereby. But when it came to asking the assembly to provide support for the itinerant justices, even though the practice of other colonies was cited, the subject was postponed or met with an absolute negative. The reasons given were, that the office was unsuited to Maryland and that it had been created without their consent. As late as November, 1713, the lower house reiterated these arguments and added the charge that the cost of the provincial court had been increased by the change. "What Trouble and Expences those Gentlemen were at on Occasion of riding the Circuits or what Damages they may suffer in their Estates thereby this House were never the Occasion of; and as they never, on Behalf of the Public requested or acquiesced in any Thing relating to those Commissions for the Assizes but always shewed their Aversion thereto, so they think it very unreasonable the Country should be burthened with the Charge, but that those that set them to work ought to pay them for their Charges,² Trouble and Expences." In this dogged fashion did the conservatism of the province and its aversion to institutions imposed from without assert itself in this case.

Another interesting episode in the judicial history of the time arose from a complaint of the lower house, in 1711, that the provincial court was making null and void acts which had passed all the stages of legislation in the province, and especially a law of the last session for relieving certain grievances. This it did, not by a declaration that the act was illegal or unconstitutional, but by the court entertaining petty suits against persons contrary to the terms of the act.³ This the house attributed to the pernicious activity of Lawrence who was secretary of the province, counsellor, and a judge of the provincial court. This led to another protest against the accumulation of several offices in the same hand, and a threat that, if the grievance was not redressed, they would not vote the levy for the year. It was also suggested that some had declared laws to be of no force until the crown had acted upon them. But the firmness of the council prevailed, the levy was voted and further debate on the subject was waived by the lower house.

¹ Md. Arch. XIX, 42, 175; XXIV, 165, 182; XXVII, 63, 68, 88, 113; C. O. 5/715, Scheme of Md. Courts, rec'd. Apr. 9, 1701. Seymour to Board July 3, 1705; C. O. 5/716, Seymour to Board, June 23, 1708.

² Md. Arch. XXVII, 199, 285, 457, 521; XXIX, 225, 293; C. O. 5/717, Pres. & Council to Board, Nov. 4, 1710.

³ Md. Arch. XXIX, 16, 22-28, 52 et seq.

In March, 1701/2, Governor Blakiston had communicated to the assembly a letter from the king asking that, for the safety of Maryland, £600 sterling should be appropriated toward the building of a fort in New York, and also that a quota of men should be sent thither if occasion should require.¹ The burgesses, after debate, informed the governor that they were unable at best to give more than £300, and to do this they would have to leave debts for a state house, school, church and prison unpaid and the province in a weak state of defence against the Indians. In their judgment it would be better to devote the money to measures of local defence. Various emphatic arguments they used in support of this policy and asked the governor to present them to the crown, as they were plain matters of fact and undoubted truths. The result, they hoped, would be that they would be excused from any contribution in aid of New York.

In February, 1702/3, a letter was received from Lord Cornbury giving an account of the poor condition of the New York forts and asking that the quota be ready early in the spring. When, in May, he asked that the £300, which had been voted, be sent to him in the form of bills on some person in London, the council replied that the province had formerly been at great charge in remitting money to New York and the assembly had resolved that the amount now voted should be paid by the treasurers to such persons as should be sent from New York to receive it. About the beginning of August Sir Thomas Lawrence went to New York to meet Cornbury and offered to carry bills for £300 and bring back a discharge for them, but the council decided to make the payment in some other way and nothing was done. In October Colonel Quarry, who was going to New York, was asked by the council to remove any misapprehensions there as to reasons why the money had not been sent. He promised to do this, though by this time it would evidently have been difficult to persuade anyone that Maryland was not quibbling. In fact neither money nor bills left the province. At the close of July, 1703, Blakiston, then agent, wrote, "I have fully discoursed the Lords of Trade about it and you need not be under any misapprehension of paying any of your quota unless Virginia or the adjacent neighbors of Pennsylvania club theirs, which I am confident the latter will never be reconciled to and I believe Virginia will never assent to." In the following spring, when a letter from the board of trade with a copy of the royal order for the quota was laid before the burgesses, they repeated this statement as the substance of what their agent had written them. Though they wrote to Blakiston to find, if possible, some way to relieve them from this burden, it was probably not necessary, for there is no evidence that the demand was repeated.¹

¹ Md. Arch. XXIV, 208, 225, 227, 235, et seq.; C. O. 5/715, Memorial of Blakiston to Board of Trade, recd. Aug. 23, 1704.

In 1704, while the question of the quota was still under discussion, a rumor came from England that New York cherished a design of making the other colonies tributary to it, to have commissions chosen from them to meet at New York instead of in their own assemblies and to have one viceroy and general of all the forces of the continent. The Maryland council, as if alarmed by this, suggested to the lower house that the £300 which had not been sent to New York might be forwarded to England for use by Blakiston in thwarting such evil designs against the constitution of the province. But the lower house refused to concur and insisted that the fund remain where it was. A conference however was held and a joint address was sent to the queen in which they dwelt on the disadvantage and burdens of such a union, the poor could not endure the cost of it and the rich would avoid it by removing to England, it would draw away merchants and artificers and impose intolerable cost in the form of military quotas and the expense of sending delegates thither to attend councils, assemblies and courts. So different also was the economic and social system of Maryland from that of New York that laws made in the latter place could not be "agreeable to the trade and Affaires of this Countrey nor the constitution of the inhabitants¹ of this province." With these illuminating remarks on the obstacles to colonial union, as they were conceived in the early years of the eighteenth century, this episode closed.

¹ Md. Arch. XXV, 137, 159, 160; XXIV, 386; C. O. 5/715, Sir Thomas Lawrence, Oct. 25, 1703.

In 1704 Governor Seymour wrote that the militia was then ill-regulated and unserviceable, though the existing militia act might seem to answer the purpose of the royal instruction that all planters and Christian servants should be fitly armed and obliged to muster; but experience showed that it was not practicable in Maryland. As generally was the case, this was due to the inability, for various reasons, of many to provide themselves with arms and ammunition. But the Quaker element in the population of this province bulked large in the mind of Seymour, and he never tired of emphasizing the obstacles which they threw in the way of his administration, in military as in other affairs. Later in the same year the militia law of 1699 was reenacted practically without change and to continue in force for three years.² Both of these acts contained the usual provisions about levy, training and service, arms and pay, for troopers as well as for foot soldiers. Slaves and free negroes were exempted from service. Provision was made for the wounded and for the widows and children of the slain. Because of his conviction that the poor could not equip themselves, Seymour urged that they be eased by allowing three taxables to unite for the furnishing of one man and horse and two taxables in the same way for one foot soldier.

In April, 1707, the governor and council informed the burgesses of the orders of the crown that the Quakers be compelled to contribute a proportional share toward the charge of militia and defence, but that levies by distress upon them for their defaults should not be inequitable or in excess of those imposed on others. The governor proposed that this should be provided for in a supplementary militia law, and as the provision for levying fines simply on the goods and clothes of the negligent often failed of its purpose because they had no personal estate, he also urged that they be imprisoned.¹ But to this the burgesses would not agree. In December, 1708, the lower house resolved that the militia act "be not revived as it now stands." Their objection appears to have been to a clause which authorized the governor and council, during a recess of assemblies, to levy an assessment upon the inhabitants, not to exceed 50,000 pounds of tobacco, for the payment of small charges.² The governor defended the clause and declared that none who had the least respect for their country would consent to leave it defenceless in case of an invasion, or be so mean as to balance its safety against such a sum as was mentioned in the act; as to that provision, he had not made use of it and had no intention of so doing. The act was revived, but only until the end of the next session of assembly. In November, 1709, after Seymour's death, the council again urged the lower house to empower field officers to cause the arrest as well as to levy upon the goods of those who failed to perform their military duties. The burgesses now consented and the former law was revived with the amendment desired by the council.³ Because of a defect in its form of enactment this law was disallowed by the crown, but because of its great importance it was soon after passed again and that with the approval of the home government.

¹ Md. Arch. XXVI, 43, 83, 125, 131, 140, 172-178, 213, 263, 446, 487.

² Md. Arch. XXVI, 269; C. O. 5/715, Seymour to B. T. May 23, 1704, July 3, 1705.

Throughout the period which we are now considering relations between Maryland and the Indians were quiet. Treaties with those who lived within her borders were renewed without change in 1704 and again early in Hart's administration, ten years later.⁴ In the interval the great Tuscarora war had occurred, but it had not disturbed the quiet of Maryland or its frontiers. In 1705 Richard Clarke, of Arundel county, and

¹ Md. Arch. XXVII, 103, 104, 120.

² Ibid., 259; ibid., XXVI, 274.

³ Ibid., XXVII, 397, 404, 483; C. O. 5/717, Order of Council, Nov. 2, 1710. Lloyd to Board, Jan. 25, 1711/12.

⁴ Md. Arch. XXIV, 329, 339; C. O. 5/720, Hart to Bolingbroke, July 11, 1714.

certain sympathizers formed a plot against the government, as to the details of which little is known. It was said that they hoped for aid from the Indians. Such peril as there was brought home to the authorities the great need in which they stood of arms and ammunition, and especially of a storehouse for these at the capital, and of a storekeeper under whose charge they could be preserved and the supply renewed when necessary. Clark himself fled to North Carolina, but was ultimately arrested and executed as a traitor. Two of his accomplices were sold as servants.¹

In April, 1706, the governor informed the assembly of a recent report that a thousand Senecas were coming from the north to destroy or carry off the Indians of the eastern shore, but the lower house replied that they did not fear any immediate danger and refused to further consider the matter.² Early in Seymour's administration an act was passed to settle the boundaries of the Nanticoke tribe, but in 1710 some disaffection had arisen from alleged encroachments on their lands. The lower house appointed a committee to adjust the matter and no further difficulty occurred.³ The Maryland tribes themselves were already insignificant and, as the French were then situated for war, the internal peace of the province could no longer be broken by rumors of Indian raids combined with plots of the discontented.

In the session of March, 1707, perhaps as a result of the alarms which had preceded, there was considerable discussion of the manner in which the province supply of arms should be kept. At that time they were lodged in the magazine at Annapolis, and the lower house proposed that, as had been the custom, they be distributed among the counties. To this the upper house replied that, although it was sometimes necessary for immediate security and defence that a small quantity of arms and ammunition be stored in the counties, to be made use of by such as were not able to procure them at their own cost, yet as strict account of what was purchased with the three-penny duty was required by the crown, and as in the past arms and ammunition lodged in the counties had been misused, spoiled and lost, they could not advise the governor to distribute them. After some discussion it was agreed to keep the arms and ammunition in the magazine, but under a guard, so that they might be safe, and the governor promised to dismiss the guard when he was convinced that it was no longer necessary.¹ In 1711 and again in 1712 the upper house urged that small magazines be built in the respective counties for the reception of arms and ammunition, but this was voted down by the delegates, either because it was expensive or because of the loose and easy management of them by the county commanders, in whose hands they usually were.²

¹ Md. Arch. XXV, 37, 117, 218-224, 262; XXVI, 441, 450, 513; XXVII 139; C. O. 5/715, Seymour to Board, July 3, and Aug. 28, 1705, Mar. 6, 1706/7, Aug. 16, 1707.

² Md. Arch. XXV, 190; XXVI, 532 et seq.

³ Md. Arch. XXVII, 505, 546; C. O. 5/715, Seymour's remarks on Maryland laws, rec'd. Oct. 1705, No. 48.

Captain John Hart, nephew of the then archbishop of Tuam, and a soldier who had served several years in Spain and Portugal, was the fourth and last royal appointee to the governorship of Maryland.³ Hart assumed the duties of his office in 1713. The death of Queen Anne, which soon followed, and the accession of the Hanoverian king were duly proclaimed by him under the elaborate orders which were sent to all the colonies with a view to securing a peaceful transition at a time of great political uncertainty in Europe. Hart had been appointed governor at the request of Benedict Leonard Calvert, the son and heir of Charles, third Lord Baltimore. Charles Calvert, the same whose powers of government had been taken away or suspended in 1690, was now an aged man. He had remained through life a faithful Catholic and in that faith he died, February 20, 1714/15. Toward the close of 1713 Benedict, probably from motives which were largely political, renounced Catholicism and became a communicant of the English Church. His father, because of resentment at this change, at once withdrew the annuity of £450 which had been used for the education of Benedict's children, and thus forced the son to fall back upon his wife's settlement. The children were taken from the Catholic schools on the Continent, where they had been kept, and were placed in Protestant schools near London. A pension of £300 a year was granted Benedict by the queen, to continue during the life of his father. It was also on his suggestion that Hart was appointed governor, and he out of his profits in Maryland agreed to allow Benedict £500 per annum. By these means the loss of the annuity was more than made good, and the chief obstacle to the restoration of proprietary government in Maryland was removed. The death of the aged Charles Calvert and also of the queen, which soon followed, still further facilitated the change.

¹ Md. Arch. XXVII, 6, 27, 28, 30, 33, 48, 58.

² Md. Arch. XXIX, 49, 97, 98, 155.

³ Md. Arch. XXV, 271 et seq.

With the accession of George I began that policy of conciliation and neglect, followed in the interest of peace and of the new dynasty, which was to give character to the attitude of the British government toward the colonies for the next thirty years. One of the first conspicuous instances of this was the ease with which the new government fell in with the desire of the Calvert family for the restoration of their powers of government in Maryland. Viewed from the strict imperialistic standpoint, which had been maintained during the previous generation, this was a step backward. How was it possible to reconcile it with the bills which had been introduced into parliament for the recall of all the charters? A more reasonable and consistent course would have been to correct the apparent arbitrariness of the original suspension of their governmental powers by inducing the Calverts to make a formal surrender of them. Their influence could not have been such as to make concessions in so important a matter necessary, or to enable them long to hold out against the pressure of government. Randolph was now dead and the voices of others with whom he had been associated in the relentless campaign against chartered colonies were stilled. Therefore, in response to a petition from Benedict Calvert, his right to appoint the governor of Maryland was allowed to revive, and he issued a commission to the same John Hart who had been acting for a year and more under a commission from the crown. This appointment, of course, was duly submitted to the king for his approval and the necessary oaths and bonds¹ were taken and given. The other steps which were necessary to the complete restoration of the proprietary régime followed in regular order. Viewed in the light of what was necessary to a consistent and comprehensive administration of the colonies, this event must be classed with these acts of Charles II by which, during the period of the Restoration, so much was done to multiply and extend proprieties and that at a time when the main trend of colonial administration was in exactly the opposite direction. But the course of British colonial administration was far from being consistent, and out of its inconsistencies in part the system of American liberty grew up.

¹ C. O. 5/717. Docs. rec'd. and read by Board of Trade, May, 1715.

CHAPTER XXIII

VIRGINIA DURING THE ADMINISTRATION OF ALEXANDER SPOTSWOOD, 1710-1722

IN the history of Virginia no other governor after Berkeley impressed himself upon the life of the province as did Alexander Spotswood. When one thinks of Virginia in the early eighteenth century the name and the stately figure of this man are at once suggested to the mind. Though he was at the head of the government by no means as long as Berkeley, he was quite as autocratic in his temper, broader and more progressive in policy, and in every relation a leader and dominant personality. His ample correspondence, the most detailed of all Virginia governors before Dinwiddie, gives one a clearer idea of his character and views than in the case of most officials it is possible to obtain. This is due not merely to the number and length of his letters, but also to the vigor with which Spotswood expressed his own views and assailed those of his opponents. His spirit coincided well with the policy of the reign of Anne, for he was a high Tory and defender of the prerogative in matters of church and state, and an aggressive imperialist in his relations with the Indians, the French and with neighboring colonies. His letters make it clear that he had been on rather intimate terms with William Blathwayt, and these he sought to continue, though Blathwayt was now approaching the end of his long career.¹

During the interval of some four months between the arrival of Spotswood in Virginia and the meeting of his first assembly, in October, 1710, several routine matters, referred to in his instructions or made important by the war which still continued, came up for consideration. One of these related to the method of selling the right to collect the quit rents. Some years before this had been changed from the old form of auction, or by inch of candle, to direct public sale. This change Spotswood now confirmed.¹ One of his instructions provided that the positions of naval officer and collector of royal customs should not be in the hands of the same person. This regulation he found had generally been obeyed since the beginning of Nicholson's administration, and there is evidence to show that it became permanent. But the receiver of provincial revenue, popularly called "collector," and a district naval officer had sometimes to be the same person, because the revenue was not sufficient for the support of two. This was true in the case of Nathaniel Harrison, whom Spotswood appointed to the two offices for the upper district of the James river.² In pursuance of an order of council, Spotswood issued a proclamation announcing the disallowance of the latest Virginia act establishing ports and towns.³

¹ Spotswood Letters, in Colls. of Va. Hist. Soc. I, 5. Spotswood Letters II, 298. Spotswood says he served nine years under Lord Cadogan as lieutenant-quartermaster-general of the British army in Flanders. This was in part at least in Anne's reign and so under Marlborough. He had the rank of colonel and was wounded at Blenheim.

The question of guardships for the coast was suggested by the discovery that illegal trade was being carried on with the islands of Curaçoa and St. Thomas. In the temporary absence of a man-of-war in the bay, vessels had taken on large quantities of tobacco and landed it on these foreign islands before visiting the British colonies for which they had cleared. French and Spanish privateers had also visited the coast and had seized vessels and kept the inhabitants about the capes in continued alarms. Of the guardships which had been stationed in Virginia, one had been lost on the North Carolina coast and another had gone to New York to refit and thence to the Bahamas. In addition to urging the customs officers on the lower James to keep boats and hands for use in inspecting vessels engaged in trade, Spotswood also advised that an agent victualler for the men-of-war be stationed in Virginia, as in other colonies, to provide them with supplies. He also called attention to the fact that, at a small charge, a place for careening vessels could be fitted up at Point Comfort and thus save the necessity of their going to New York for the purpose. As the fort at the Point was in decay, he urged that it be rebuilt as a place of retreat for vessels when pursued by privateers and a place also to which the sick from royal ships could be brought for care and recovery. He suggested that a company of invalids from Chelsea might be sent over to garrison it, the charge for them in excess of what they already cost being supplied from the quit rents. These recommendations he enforced by the statement that at that time there was not a fort nor a piece of cannon mounted in the whole province. In view of this it is not strange that in his opening speech to the legislature Spotswood "whispered" to them of the state of the militia and defence, because it was so poor that it should be concealed from neighbors and slaves. This last reference may have been suggested by recent disturbances among the slaves in three of the counties. The only comfort he got from the board of trade on this subject was the remark that, if the charge of building a fort at Point Comfort was so small and if it was so important to the inhabitants, they would no doubt readily contribute to that work.¹ But the burgesses could be induced to appropriate money for the fort only on the supposition that the crown would furnish the garrison, and as a result nothing was done.

¹ Spotswood Letters, I, 7, 8; C. O. 5/1363, Va. Entry Bk. Feb. 23, 1709/10.

² Virginia was districted for this purpose and there were several naval officers and collectors in the province. An instruction that the two offices should be in different hands had been issued both to Nicholson and Nott.

³ Spotswood Letters, I, 9, 11, 15, 33.

Before the close of October, however, Spotswood reported that two guardships had come in and so Virginia was comfortably off in that particular. But he continued to argue that New York, with its agent victualler and careening place, was much better provided with convoys and guardships than was Virginia, though the annual tobacco crop of the latter colony was so much more valuable to the crown than the trade of New York. He continued his search for the parties who were guilty of illegal trade with the foreign West Indies, but his inability to get information from the books of the collector and naval officer of the Lower James led him again to urge in council the necessity of searching the outgoing vessels, and he found its members unanimously of the same opinion. But at that time nothing was done. The following spring we find Spotswood, after conferring with Quarry, proposing to the customs board the appointment of two additional searchers for the bay, with boats and helpers, that they might continuously cruise in the inlets and creeks where small vessels were in the habit of loading. Salaries for these might be found by discontinuing two of the three collectors who had been stationed on the York and James rivers. But of action on this proposal there is no evidence.

¹ C. O. 5/1363, Va. Entry Bk. Oct. 26, 1710.

The instructions to Spotswood contained a clause to the effect that persons set at liberty by habeas corpus should not be recommitted for the same offence except by the court where they were to appear. This involved a recognition of the writ of habeas corpus as legal in Virginia, and as such it was proclaimed by the governor among his instructions relating to the liberty of the subject and was duly welcomed by the house of burgesses.¹ In connection with this the governor made known his instruction that two courts of oyer and terminer should be held annually, but the council thought that was provided for by the law establishing the general court, in which it was provided that all criminals should be brought to trial on the fourth day of every session of this tribunal.

Among the royal instructions the one which was to have the most important effect was that which required that on penalty of forfeiture, three acres of land in every fifty granted should be settled and cultivated within three years from the date of the grant. It appears that an instruction on this subject had been given to Colonel Nott in 1705 and a similar one to Hunter in 1707, the latter not reaching the province. Difficulties had been raised against executing it in Nott's time, on the ground that it was inconsistent with the charter and laws of Virginia and contrary to express agreements made with purchasers. Its terms were also said to be hard, so that people would remove to North Carolina rather than submit to them.² In order not to prejudice the people at the time of the election of his first assembly, Spotswood did not publish this instruction, but instead issued a proclamation to disabuse the popular mind of the idea that it was more severe than in reality was the case.³ And yet it was understood that the chief grievance which would be aired in the next session concerned the taking up of land, and Spotswood thought he discerned among the voters a prejudice against large landholders and a tendency to exclude gentlemen from the election as burgesses. But in the large number of petitions which at the beginning of the session came in from the counties, on subjects local and general, no special emphasis seems to have been laid on this question.¹

¹ C. O. 5/1363. Instructions to Spotswood; Journal of Burgesses, 1702-1712, pp. 240, 260, 262.

² C. O. 5/1316. O. P. Va., Mar. 24, 1710; Acts of P. C. Col., II, 585, 587.

³ Spotswood Letters, I, 19 et seq.

The subject of land grants occupied a prominent place in the business not only of the session of 1710 but of several which were to follow, and two rather important acts on this subject were passed during Spotswood's administration.² As the result of general looseness in administration and of speculation in head rights,³ it had been possible for persons to appropriate large tracts which remained unsettled for indefinite periods. With the connivance of surveyors it was possible for so-called grantees to hold such tracts for many years without even having a survey made or taking out a patent. Sometimes it was possible to secure five hundred acres on the account of one immigrant, though the amount legally allowed was only fifty. It was to check this monopoly, in the interest both of the crown and of future settlers, that Spotswood took up the subject. As an incident of the struggle he also labored to secure a complete rent roll of the province, an object which Blathwayt and the royal governors were always seeking but probably never attaining. The last law on the subject had been passed in 1705, and while it required settlement within three years after the grant, it was not precise as to the amount of land to be cultivated and the terms of the forfeiture.⁴ Spotswood's instruction on the subject of settling and cultivating grants at once occasioned complaint and a demand that they revert to former free and easy methods. This demand was voiced in a report of the committee of propositions and grievances in the burgesses, which was sent as a message to the governor.⁵ In his reply Spotswood defended his instruction and declared that it was

¹ Journal of Burgesses, loc. cit., 248 et seq.

² Hening, III, 517; IV, 37.

³ Spotswood Letters, II, 15, 21, 216.

⁴ Hening, III, 314.

⁵ Journal, loc. cit. 265, 293.

more in accordance with the charter of Charles II and with earlier custom in general, than had been the more recent practice. He added that he could not understand how the belief should obtain that in granting lands the sovereign could not limit the grant or consider the qualification of the grantee. A long and important act on the subject was passed this session,¹ which provided that a failure to pay quit rents for three years would effect a forfeiture of land, and that on a failure of the grantee to give a correct account to the sheriff of the amount he held, and to obtain grants for the surplus, after notice anyone could procure a survey of the land and take out a grant for the surplus. This provision was important, if it could be executed, and Spotswood took considerable credit to himself for its passage. But the new law did not repeal that part of the act of 1705 which referred to the seating of land, while it helped to fasten a law of entail on Virginia which in practice could be broken only by act of assembly. An early act of 1666, which contained some very loose provisions concerning the settlement of land was still unrepealed and this, at Spotswood's request, was repealed the following year.² In view of this and of the fact that the law of 1710 did not reenact the provisions of that of 1705 concerning the granting of land, Spotswood considered that granting and settling were now wholly in the hands of the crown, where they belonged. He thought that no more laws should be made on that subject, because they led the people to believe that the issue of such regulations belonged to them as a right. Hence, to preempt the subject for the executive, he issued a proclamation making known the terms of his instructions, and in addition prescribing that no grant in excess of four hundred acres would be made until the governor was informed of the capacity of the would-be grantee to cultivate more.³ In pursuance of this instruction, that regard be had to the differing varieties of land, it was required that grants should be laid out so that their breadth might be at least one-third of their length, unless prevented by rivers and impassable swamps. Surveyors were also required to return plans of the tracts along with their surveys. These regulations occasioned much criticism as being ex post facto and also more strict than those to which the colonists had been accustomed. For this reason the governor suspended the proclamation in the case of rights which had been purchased before any report came of the intended change.¹

¹ Hening, III, 517. Spotswood later explained this to mean that no lands once entered on the roll of the receiver general would be forfeited until, after a formal demand and a reasonable time given, the owner refused to pay. This would secure all lands which were honestly declared and endanger those which were knavishly concealed. C. O. 5/1318, p. 209, O. P. Va.

² C. O. 5/1363, Feb. 22 and Mar. 6, 1710-11, E. B. Va.

³ C. O. 5/1316, O. 76, Proc. of Dec. 8, 1710.

But this, of course, was not the end of legislation on this subject. In November, 1713, an act was passed applying especially to barren, marshy and swampy land, unfit for cultivation but often containing quarries and mines.² As settlement receded into the interior, more land was of this quality. The act provided that the breadth of such grants should equal at least one third of their length, and that surveyors should return general statements of the quality of the land they laid out. The keeping of a certain number of cattle, sheep or goats on such grants, or the employment of one man per hundred acres digging in a stone quarry or in a coal or other mines, would be sufficient to give possession. But information laid before the executive council in 1717 shows that the old abuses had not disappeared. Land was then being kept for many years on a bare entry of survey without patent.³ Entries were also made for lands suitable for the production of pitch and tar without the design of taking out patents and the lightwood found there was gathered and burned, the king being thereby defrauded of his quit rents and others who would improve the land were excluded.⁴

Connected with the question of land grants arose a discussion with the general court over a practice into which it had fallen of receiving petitions for lapsed and escheated lands and ordering the issue of patents for such land. Spotswood regarded that at once as a serious encroachment on the prerogative, adjourned the court and called its members into session as the council. He then told them that he had no

¹ Spotswood Letters, I, 61.

² Henning, IV, 37 et seq.

³ Spotswood Letters, II, 216, 217.

⁴ Min. of Ex. C. Aug. 13, 1717.

objection to their inquiring into the fact of escheat or of the lapsing of grants, but with that their function ended. The power to regrant rested in the executive and, as it was now arranged, applications for lapsed lands must be made to the governor.

Before Spotswood's first assembly, as usual, came complaints of undue elections, some of which were occasioned by oft-recurring factional disputes over the dividing of existing parishes and the erection of new ones.¹ In connection with this subject Spotswood found opportunity to revive the claims of the executive which had played some part in other provinces, but never to any extent in Virginia. In his instructions the authority to erect and divide parishes was still lodged in the executive though ever since Virginia became a royal province these matters, in the case of both counties and parishes, had been regulated by statute.² He fondly believed that governors would act in these cases most disinterestedly and would never have it in their power to distress the people. Under such conditions also factional disputes would have no chance to develop.³ But he wisely waited for further orders from the board of trade before engaging in a dispute with the assembly over the subject. The difficulty, of course, arose from the existence of both counties and parishes which were so large that people had to go thirty or fifty miles to church or to the court houses. Among the many difficulties which arose under such conditions was that of securing persons to serve as justices of the peace. Another arose from the fact that in some parishes the number of tithables was too small adequately to support a church, while in others there were many more than enough for this purpose. When the governor looked to the assembly for the remedy of these evils, he found that the freeholders who had already located the court houses and churches to suit their convenience, together with those who were indifferent in elections, would always outvote the injured and choose burgesses of their own party. But, he wrote, if the board of trade should order him so to do, he would take up this question and, if he succeeded in the struggle, would have a complete survey of counties and parishes made. By this route too he hoped to arrive at a true rent roll of the province, but no order to undertake the task came from England.¹

¹ Spotswood Letters, I, 20.

² Osgood, Am. Colonies in 17th Century, III, 81, 82.

³ Spotswood Letters, I, 37, et seq.

In considering the land question and that of the great size of the western-most parishes and counties, the attention of Spotswood had been drawn to the facilities which were opened to Virginia, by following up the course of the James river, to cross the mountains and establish settlements beyond. Reports, as we have seen, had already reached Virginia of the activity of the French in the interior, and before the end of his first year there Spotswood had sent horsemen to explore the first ridge to the westward. He also urged the board of trade to exempt settlers on the upper James from the new and more rigid conditions of land grants, so that they might be encouraged to press forward over the mountains, open trade with the remote Indians and by that means establish a barrier against the French. But from a reply which the board made about a year later it was evident that it took no special interest in this subject.²

Such was the permanent and customary attitude of the British government toward projects of this kind. But in this instance Spotswood's interest was kept active by what he learned of deposits of iron which were thought to exist near the falls of the James. He asked the assembly to give him some aid toward the working of mines there, but found the tidewater majority indifferent. When the board of trade heard of this project, it was not only indifferent but actually opposed, because of the prospect it opened of the development of the manufacture of iron in Virginia. It forbade the governor to assent to any act for such a purpose, unless it contained a clause deferring its execution until the queen's pleasure was known. Secretary Popple also wrote him that the board did not consider it to be for the advantage of the kingdom that such an undertaking should be encouraged.³ But, in 1714, Spotswood was able to settle forty Germans on the Rapidan, where they engaged in mining for iron or other

¹ Spotswood Letters, I, 39, 40.

² C. O. 5/1363, E. B. Va., B. T. to Spotswood, Nov. 22, 1711.

³ Ibid., Jan. 29 and June 29, 1711, E. B. Va.

ores. They had originally come under the Baron de Graffenried to North Carolina, but his plans there had been wrecked by the Tuscaroras, who had just withdrawn. Spotswood located his Palatine miners in this place. Such was the origin of the famous, though not very productive, mining settlement of Germanna, where Spotswood gradually secured a tract of some 45,000 acres, to which he retired after the close of his term as governor, thus laying the foundation of what was to be Spotsylvania county.¹

Another question, which was largely territorial in its character, was that of the North Carolina boundary. Disputed titles to land in the Blackwater region, as we have seen, made this a live issue until the line was finally established to the satisfaction of both parties. Uncertainty in reference to the subject increased the difficulty of maintaining peace among the Indians, and a petition from certain of those that they might receive the land which had been reserved to them by the articles of peace in 1677, and which lay within the disputed area, helped to bring the subject forward again for consideration. Spotswood urged that a decision be reached on the question and in this was supported by the board of trade; but the condition of anarchy in North Carolina was so general during his entire administration that nothing could be accomplished.

As usual in this period, the price of tobacco ranged low and trade was therefore depressed. Large numbers of slaves were imported and they were employed solely in the production of the Virginia staple. Overproduction was the result, its influence being felt first in those sections which produced the poorer qualities of tobacco. In order, therefore, to procure their necessary clothing the inhabitants were forced to plant cotton and sow flax, and by mixing cotton with their wool to make coarse cloth for negroes and the poorer whites. This had now become so general that in one of the best tobacco counties 40,000 yards of woollen, cotton and linen cloth were reported to have been made in one year. Though other counties had, no doubt, increased manufacturing, it was done through necessity and by unskilled workmen.¹ But the knowledge that such a tendency existed, encouraged the governor to enlarge upon the advantages of Virginia for the production of naval stores. Pitch and tar were already produced in good quantities, but hemp, he said, should be encouraged. As merchants thought only of tobacco, enterprise and skill were not devoted to new ventures, and Virginia failed to secure the advantages of the bounties offered by parliament on the production of naval stores.² Spotswood therefore proposed that the government accept them in payment of duties on tobacco, and that these products be sent to Europe under convoy with the tobacco fleets. As the condition of the tobacco industry closely affected revenue, it frequently came up in that connection. In 1712, in particular, because the tobacco used in payment of quit rents and taxes was often the worst trash, Spotswood secured the passage of an act requiring that all such payments be made at public stores under the view of sworn officials and inspectors called agents. The notes of the agents, bought by purchasers of this tobacco and circulating like bank bills, would enable them to have their product delivered at any convenient time or place. This subject came up later in connection with discussions of the revenue but that will properly follow some consideration of Virginia affairs as they stood related to the war which was then in its latest stage.

¹ See William Byrd's account of his visit to the ex-governor there in 1732. Basset's Edition of Byrd's "Dividing Line," 355, et seq. Spotswood Letters, II, 70, 196, et seq.

About the beginning of July, 1711, Spotswood received advice from Governor Hunter, of New York, that the queen had directed him to buy a large quantity of provisions for the use of the troops which were to go on the expedition of that year against Canada. Provisions being scarce in the neighboring governments, he desired Spotswood to buy all the pork to be had and to pay for it out of the royal revenue, so far as it would go, and to offer for the rest bills, which Hunter said he was empowered to draw on the British treasury. All the available stock of pork in Virginia — 700 barrels or more — was bought by Spotswood for this purpose, he using the entire balance of quit rents in the treasury and pledging his own credit so far as the royal revenue proved insufficient.¹ He congratulated himself that the assembly was not in session at the time, for it might have hindered him by fixing prices, and also that the quit rents had been increased by the recent discovery of 10,000 acres of concealed lands.

¹ Spotswood Letters, I, 25, 44, 46.

² Ibid., I, 73.

While the resources available for the use of the Virginia executive were being exhausted in this service, the Cary rebellion, followed by the Tuscarora war in North Carolina, demanded Spotswood's attention. A French squadron was also known to be operating in the West Indies and might visit the Virginia coast, where they would find favorable conditions for plunder. The coast also was never free from danger of possible visits by privateers. Under these conditions the problem of defence was of the greatest immediate importance. The militia, while potentially more than 12,000 in number, was as usual almost destitute of ammunition, their arms were poor and they were poorly disciplined. The province also had no coast defences. As in the previous session the assembly had revived an earlier law for the defence of the province in the time of danger, Spotswood now took advantage of that law for the purpose, if possible, of building four small forts and some other lines of defence on the James river and mounting cannon upon them. He was obstructed, however, by certain Quakers, who refused to work or to let their servants work or to contribute anything toward defence. The law was enforced against them to the full extent of fines and other penalties, but with what positive result does not appear.²

The first occasion which Spotswood had to use the military force of the province was when, in the early summer of 1711, he called out the militia of several counties along the southern frontier and sent a company of marines from the guardships into North Carolina to overawe Cary and his insurgent followers. This contributed to the restoration of internal peace in that distracted province.³ But immediately it was broken by the outbreak of the Indian war. This called again for a military demonstration for the purpose of keeping quiet the Indians along the southern border of Virginia. The militia of three neighboring counties, to the number of six hundred, were called together at Nottaway Town, and there a conference was held with chiefs of that part of the Tuscarora nation which had not joined in the massacres. They expressed sorrow for what had happened, and their promises on the subject greatly strengthened Spotswood's hopes that, by educating sufficient Indian youths at William and Mary College and elsewhere, that race might be civilized and permanent peace secured.¹

¹ Spotswood Letters, I, 99, 103, 151, 152, 155; C. O. 5/1316, O. P. Va. Feb. 4, 1713. The cost of the pork was £2099, of which nearly £1233 was advanced by the governor of Virginia on his own credit, for which Gov. Hunter was to draw bills on the British treasury. This had not been paid him in 1713. About £867 were also advanced out of the Virginia quit rents, making the above total of £2099.

² Spotswood Letters, I, 120, 133.

³ Osgood, Am. Colonies in 17th century, II, 249, 430.

When the assembly met in November, Spotswood enlarged on these events and policies, and urged that the debts which had been incurred should be discharged.² He stated that he had been as frugal as possible, and that he heard that years before as much had been spent against a single privateer. The burgesses first went into committee of the whole on this speech and then referred to a special committee the task of finding out what forts had previously existed in the province, how charges for them had been raised, and the forts themselves kept up. The final purpose of this was to bring forward again the opinions of the previous century on the utility of coast and river defences,³ whether they had not been allowed to decay because they had not been worth the cost. Another question was, whether batteries were a Virginia charge and, if so, whether such charge should be paid by a poll tax or otherwise. Any member of the house could lay proposals before this committee, and it was to bring in an address to the governor on the subject of fortifications. They should also consider what could be done to prevent allowances made this session from becoming precedents. This, and more, indicated a resolve to present a firm front against some, at least, of the proposals of the intelligent and aggressive governor.

About a week after the beginning of the session Spotswood

¹ Spotswood Letters, 124 et seq.; N. C. Col. Recs. I, 781 et seq.

² Journal of Burgesses. Nov., 1711, to Jan., 1711-2. Several interesting subjects were mooted at this session to which I make no reference here.

³ Osgood, op. cit., III, 256.

sent in a message on a proposal from King William county that rangers be called out in the frontier counties for protection against the Indians. In view of the Tuscarora war, he thought that it was necessary and stated that he had designated ten men and one officer out of each of the frontier counties to range weekly above the settlements, and that these should be increased to twenty if the number of the enemy required it. Various other communications were sent in by the governor on the defects of the militia and the need of a really effective law on that subject. He held up North Carolina as a fearful example of the anarchy into which failure to provide for defence would plunge a colony. This finally drew from the house a resolution that £20,000 be raised for carrying on war, in case it should be declared against the Tuscaroras. But, in order to provide this sum, the burgesses proposed to levy duties on imports from Europe, including British products. This gave Spotswood the chance to make the charge that they were trying to shift the burden from their own shoulders to those of the English merchants. At the same time he was able to conclude a treaty with a part of the Tuscaroras, which materially reduced the scope of the struggle. In view of this, the council insisted that the title of the appropriation bill be changed, so that it would not imply that they were going to war with the whole of the Tuscarora nation. Among other important criticisms of the bill they also proposed that, in the clause which imposed a duty on imports, exception be made of certain classes of goods brought from Great Britain.¹ The burgesses granted a conference committee on this message, but would accept no amendment by the council except to the preamble and title of the bill. As to the contents and the rates of duty therein prescribed, this was all claimed as the exclusive right of the house. To this the council made reply at length, protesting against being subject to precedents which applied only to the house of lords, especially in view of the fact that the two branches of the legislature in Virginia had so long sat as one house and equally shared all functions.

At this juncture came a sharp message from the governor, to the effect that the session had continued nearly two months without the passage of any important legislation and that at last they had agreed upon an appropriation bill so extraordinary that it could not be passed without a suspending clause. The house, in its reply to this, explained the attitude it had taken on all the subjects proposed in the governor's speech and showed no sign of acceding any more fully to his views. As this attitude was unchanged when they returned after an adjournment of a month, he dissolved the assembly at the end of January, 1711/12.

¹ Journal of Burgesses, Dec. 13, 1711. Spotswood Letters, I, 131.

Owing to this result, various claims failed of allowance by the burgesses, among them being the keep of eighty French prisoners and of the marines who guarded them, a small sum which Spotswood had expended on batteries, another sum for a spy boat which had cruised for the summer between the capes as a protection against surprise, and the pay of the militia whom Spotswood had called out when he met the Indians at Nottoway Town.¹ Upon the attitude of the burgesses toward all these matters Spotswood enlarged with characteristic force, and doubtless some exaggeration, in his letters which accompanied the dispatch of the journals home. The contrast between the spirit of the house in the previous session and in this made its later conduct to him scarcely recognizable. The parsimony of the average representative of a colonial constituency came in for some pointed comment at his hands. He thought that scarcely any other qualification was necessary for success at the polls. After the session closed some of the members had acknowledged that their proceedings had been due to certain rash votes passed without foresight, which later they could not set aside without breaking the rules of the house, and so they would let the province suffer rather than acknowledge themselves in error. But Spotswood was confident that, though he had broken with the burgesses, the province liked his administration, and he believed that the next election would bring him a loyal assembly. Some of the council had, meantime, advanced money to enable him to execute the treaty with the Tuscaroras, and he hoped to protect Virginia from Indian attacks; but North Carolina was in great danger and he could not aid her as he should like to do.²

¹ Ibid., 138 et seq.

² Ibid., 145, 146.

In the following spring Virginia was saved from the expenditure, which would have been occasioned by sending two hundred men to North Carolina, by the treaty which Barnwell suddenly concluded with the Tuscaroras.¹ But even with this saving Virginia was now in financial difficulties, for an order came for the remission to the English exchequer of £3,000 out of the quit rents, though they had been overdrawn for the Canadian expedition. On account of depression in the tobacco trade, the revenue from the 2s. per hogshead was so low, that the whole of the last year's salaries were in arrear.² The debt which had been contracted, together with the necessity of continuing the rangers on the frontiers, necessitated the holding of an election for a new assembly. It came together in October, 1712. As most of the old members had been returned, Spotswood expected little, and in his opening speech briefly told them that he had called them together to provide for the payment of the public debts. But instead the house at once became absorbed in the consideration of proposals, grievances and claims. While they were engaged on this task, an address was received from the assembly of North Carolina calling for speedy aid. Within a year that province had suffered three bloody massacres, and all that its inhabitants now desired to save was their lives, not their property. Spotswood urged the assembly to give assistance at once. A committee of conference with the council was appointed, and before it were laid three letters from Carolina containing, among other things, an appeal for clothing and for the protection of its destitute inhabitants in the approaching winter. As a result of discussion the house agreed not to give but to lend that province 900 yards of duffels and in addition to appropriate £1,000 for their relief.³ The governor was entrusted with the expenditure of this sum and, at the time when it was appropriated, an agreement had not been reached as to the payment of the claims which were presented at the beginning of the session. As a part of his contribution to the debate, Spotswood laid before the burgesses a statement of expenditure for the past twenty-two years, with the revenue for the same time, making it appear that, since 1689, the funds which had been raised had fallen short of expenditures for salaries and contingences.¹ But in stating this account he charged the province with salaries which were paid out of the quit rents while he excluded all sums which had come from fines and forfeitures, the purchase of rights to land, and sale of queen's arms, which articles had previously been included in the revenue account and applied to the support of government. But, owing to the cost of the rangers, Spotswood was unable to induce the assembly to provide for the payment of all the claims as he desired, and therefore some had to be postponed until the next session or dropped.

¹ Ibid., 147 et seq.

² Ibid., 151, 161 et seq.

³ Journal of Burgesses, 1712-1726, pp. 27, 31.

After the appropriation for North Carolina was made Spotswood repaired to the border of that province for a conference with President Pollock and members of its council.² But Pollock did not come, and only two of the council appeared, they bringing no authority or instructions except to receive the clothing. They said that, if Virginia sent any men to their aid, it must not expect provisions for them, though the North Carolina assembly had promised to permit such when it asked for help. Their men had deserted the province, concealed themselves in it or sheltered themselves under the mask of Quakerism to avoid bearing arms. Now that they had got the clothing which Virginia furnished, they had no men under arms to use it. It was also evident that, if the cost of provisions was taken out of the £1000 which had been appropriated, the remainder would not suffice to pay even the smallest number of men with whom it would be safe to venture into the Tuscarora country. But it seemed likely that, if speedy relief did not come, all North Carolina would soon be abandoned to the Indians. Therefore, with the peculiar thrift of a royal governor, Spotswood offered to pay for the provisions out of the quit rents if the proprietary deputies would agree to cede to the crown all their territory north of the Roanoke river and Albemarle sound. Of course no agreement could be reached on such a basis, and Spotswood returned to Williamsburg without accomplishing anything. But what Virginia proved unable to accomplish, the South Carolinians under Colonel Moore achieved during the following winter, by destroying the principal post of the Indians and thus in the end compelling them to disperse. Peace was thus gradually restored in Carolina.

¹ Journal of Burgesses, loc. cit., 41; Spotswood Letters, II, 10.

² Spotswood Letters, II, 3, 11; Journal of Burgesses, loc. cit., 67, 68.

But as the Senecas had been aiding their fellow tribesmen the Tuscaroras, and their raids took them along the western frontier of Virginia, it also felt the effects of the struggle. Virginia traders were attacked and Iroquois were slain by Indians who were tributary to Virginia. Some of the Tuscaroras also settled temporarily about the heads of the Virginia rivers. Amid these disturbed conditions it was impossible to dismiss the rangers, and in the fall of 1713 it was necessary also to send a small expedition into the frontier counties. But, as necessary to a permanent pacification which would make it possible to recall the rangers, Spotswood concluded treaties not only with such of the Tuscaroras as could be brought together in conference at Williamsburg, but with various dependent tribes of Virginia Indians as well.¹ The object of these was to establish them all, together with various settlements of whites, along the Virginia frontier, under peaceful conditions. It was in connection with this that, in 1714, a small Indian reservation was laid out at Christanna, in the southern part of the province, in extent six miles square and provided with a fort and a guard of twelve men and an officer. So far as possible, all trade with Indians south of the James river was confined to this place, a magazine was to be kept up there and the governor hoped to persuade many Indians to remove thither. The establishment of an Indian school there was also a part of his scheme and, when a congregation should be gathered, the settlement of a missionary among them.

Another most interesting feature of this plan was that a company, consisting wholly of prominent Virginians, should be incorporated and given the monopoly of trade with the Indians. This was held to be a necessity, because Indian trade had fallen to a low ebb. The people engaged in it, because of lack of means, had been forced to buy their goods at retail in Virginia and therefore had exasperated the Indians by the high prices which they had charged. They had also furnished the Tuscaroras with supplies during the war and the Virginia government had not been able to prevent it. The traders from South Carolina were, moreover, said to be drawing to themselves nearly all the traffic with the Indians along the middle and southern frontier. It was to remedy these evils that an act was passed in 1714 for the incorporation of this company, the duty of maintaining the settlement at Christanna being imposed upon it in return for the trading privileges which were conceded.¹ This project did not originate with Spotswood, but with members of the house of burgesses, the governor seeking to keep it in harmony with his instructions. He also gave the measure his support in his letters home. Robert Cary, a London merchant, as agent for the company, was intrusted with the duty of securing the approval of this act in England. But there it was opposed by the British merchants who were engaged in the Virginia trade, on the ground that it provided for a monopoly and would be injurious to their interests. Though downright monopolists themselves, in this connection they sang the praises of freedom as the best in all dealings with barbarous peoples! The British authorities seem also to have been opposed to incorporated companies, as had been already shown in its discouragement of that method of regulating the production of naval stores. The result was that the act was repealed in July, 1717,—a final argument against it being that it did not contain the suspending clause which should find a place in all laws which affected British trade.²

¹ Spotswood Letters, II, 34, 53, 57; Journal of Burgesses, Nov. 1713.

Early in 1712 Spotswood, in connection with the Indian troubles, asked for a further supply of powder and arms and also for three hundred tents, from the queen's stores. The application was supported by the board of trade, but in view of the great waste of such supplies which had previously been sent to the colonies, and of the failure to make repayment for them, strong objection was made by the secretary of state to granting this request. He cited the case of military supplies sent to Virginia in 1702 to the value of £3388, repayment for which was to come out of the quit rents, but apparently nothing had been received. This subject was under discussion for several months and finally, in 1713, a considerable quantity of the desired supplies was sent.¹

¹ This act is not printed in Hening.

² Spotswood Letters, II, 144, 230 et seq.; C. O. 5/1316 and 1318, O. P. Va. May 1716 and June 1717; Acts of P. C. Col. 1680-1720, p. 721; Journal of Burgesses, 1712-1726, pp. 79, 80.

During the sessions of the assembly in 1713 and 1714 the governor's Indian policy and that of frontier settlement and defence, together with their cost, were prominent subjects of debate. At the close of 1714 he reported to the assembly that the frontiers were peaceful and that he had been able to reduce expenditures there to less than one-third of the amount spent in preceding years. If this policy was kept up in accordance with his plans, he predicted that a strong frontier would be maintained at steadily decreasing cost. In this connection he referred to the settlement at Germanna as an important part of the general plan and expressed the hope that more Protestants, of the new king's nationality, would be brought in as frontier settlers, they being as suitable as French refugees had been. Without any further supply than had been voted he would for two years more keep up four troops of rangers, the establishments at both Christanna and Germanna, would make a road to the last named place and continue trade with the Indians. Under such easy conditions the policy was naturally agreeable to the assembly and relations continued harmonious. But, in the following year, Spotswood developed the next step in his plan, which was for a standing militia of 3000 foot and 1500 horse in place of the general obligation of the whole body to muster and train. His object in this was efficiency, but it of course provoked criticism, to the effect that he was trying "to huff and bully the people" and establish arbitrary government.²

The session of the newly elected assembly, in August and September, 1715, was occasioned by the outbreak of the Yamasee war in South Carolina and the necessity of meeting the cost of such levies as were sent thither, as well as of a more careful defence of the Virginia frontier. Spotswood made this the subject of his opening message. But the opinion was now abroad in the counties that Virginia was not prosperous, and discontent began to be voiced in many petitions and grievances presented to the assembly. It had also been shown by unmistakable signs during the election. Recent acts, especially that of 1712, which had been intended for the regulation of the tobacco trade, but which had interfered with favorite local customs, were a leading object of attack. The repeal of the offensive tobacco laws was affixed as a rider to the bill for the relief of South Carolina. Certain county justices, for refusing to certify statements of grievances, were arrested by order of the house, and the governor was specially called upon to aid in the seizure of two of these who had escaped.¹ The executive council condemned the presentation of such petitions without certification by the local court as illegal and seditious, though Spotswood admitted that such had often been the practice in the past. The reproaches of the governor and council drew from the burgesses, on September 2, a sharp expression of complaint concerning the burden of taxation and the lack of regard shown to them and to the grievances which were seeking a voice through them. To this both the council and Spotswood replied,² the former in an answer to each of the resolves of the lower house, and the latter in one of the most imperious messages ever sent to a colonial assembly. Spotswood possessed the grand manner and style, and they were fully in evidence on this and later occasions. At this point began his controversies, first with the burgesses and later with certain of the councillors, which were henceforth to disturb what had till this time been a peaceful administration.

¹ C. O. 5/1363, Va. E. B., Apr., 1712, and later dates; Journal of Burgesses, 1712-1720, pp. 79, 80.

² Journal of Burgesses, 1712-1726, p. 103 et seq.; Spotswood Letters, II, 204-212.

"'Tis fit the world should know," wrote Spotswood, "what these people would have and what you prefer to the defence of your country or the relief of your neighbors. They tell you that those laws shall be repealed which prevent frauds in tobacco payments and restrain them from lessening the king's customs by shipping off their trash; that those shall be altered which oblige them to pay dearly the king's quit rents, or enable the governor to inform his majesty of the increase and decrease of the colony; that the act for regulating trade and propagating the Christian faith among the Indians shall be abrogated, the school (at Christanna) for teaching their children be demolished, and the gentlemen at whose charge it was erected be banished out of America and their estates confiscated; that officers' fees shall be reduced below what former assemblies have judged reasonable . . . ; that creditors shall be satisfied with such payments as the debtors shall think fitting to make; that in ordering the militia, securing the frontiers, commissionating justices and placing courts, the notions of the people shall be rather followed than the judgment of the king's governor; that the power of the crown shall be clipped by a triennial bill, and by excluding all officers in places of profit or trust from sitting in the assembly. In short, not to mention all the ridiculous propositions and grievances which the seditious or ignorant vulgar have set their marks to, you are by them directed to reverse such laws as the last assembly raised upon the basis of religion, justice or honour and to make those which will square only with the convenience of the meaner people. Many of them are drawn up in the handwriting of your members, and in violation of the laws for the presentation of grievances have been signed at election fields, horse races and other drunken meetings."

¹ J. of Burgesses, 1712-1726, pp. 122, 124, 132-3, 136, 140, through the session; J. of Ex. C., C. O. 5/1412, Oct. and Nov., 1715.

² J. of B., loc. cit., 159, 164, 166.

Upon this suggestive list of the offences of the freeholders and their representatives, as viewed from the standpoint of that general providence of Virginia which Spotswood aimed to be, he continued to enlarge in many more paragraphs, and concluded with the statement that the people had chosen a set of burgesses whom heaven had not endowed with the ordinary qualifications of legislators; that the chairmen of their two standing committees could not spell English or write common sense. With this parting shot he dissolved the assembly without giving it a chance to reply.¹ The tone of this speech the board of trade criticised as too incisive and feared it might anger the electors to such a degree that some time would elapse before they could be brought to good temper again.

¹ J. of Burgesses, loc. cit., 166-170; Spotswood Letters, II, 128, 130, 133-135.

An interval of three years now passed before another assembly was elected. During that time much attention was devoted to Indian affairs, to the famous journey across the mountains and to the beginning of visitations by pirates from Providence Island, which were soon to call forth decisive action on the part of Virginia.¹

The journey of exploration across the Blue Ridge was connected with Spotswood's broad policy of defence and Indian relations, which was ever extending itself so as to take in the western frontier as a whole. As this journey was made a decade before the founding of Oswego, it proves Spotswood and his companions beyond doubt to have been the pioneers among the English in the westward movement. That he fully grasped its significance is proven by a letter of his to the board of trade in 1718, in which he urged that the surplus then in the Virginia treasury might in part be used to fit out an expedition which would enable him to reach Lake Erie and thus, from Virginia, cut the French line of communication between Canada and Louisiana.² The danger of the approach of the French from the northwest he fully understood, and contended that a Virginia settlement on Lake Erie would prove an effective obstacle in their path.

The various military enterprises and plans for frontier and coast defence, in which Virginia of late had been engaged, necessitated greater attention to revenue. The attention which Spotswood had given to land grants was closely related to the same subject. Now that the price of tobacco ranged so low, the revenue from the export duty of two shillings per hogshead was not large and therefore other sources of income, especially the territorial, must be developed. As a means toward this end, the governor insisted that the keeping of accounts must be systematized, so that collectors, sheriffs and other subordinates could be held under better control and speculation or fraud prevented. The king would thus be better assured of what was really his due. Spotswood, by insisting on reforms of this kind, had been an advocate of efficiency since the beginning of his administration. For he found that, as a rule, in the offices of the deputy auditor and receiver general no books were kept with detailed and accurate statements of receipts from all sources and expenditures for all purposes, books, for example, which could be conveniently taken before the council and assembly when there was an audit or any inquiry into the state of the revenue. He could find only general accounts of gross sums and these kept on loose papers. Of escheats, fines, forfeitures, income from sales of crown lands, rent rolls or lists of names and estates which might be used by collectors of quit rents, Spotswood could not find satisfactory records, and this was an evil which affected almost every issue that might come up. Under such conditions the crown must suffer, especially at the hands of the lower officials — collectors or sheriffs — whose dependence upon it was remote. Therefore he insisted that books should be kept of receipts and expenditures in every breach of the revenue, and his effort in this direction dated almost from the beginning of his administration. When he learned that Colonel Nicholson had been appointed commissioner for stating the accounts of all the royal revenues on the continent of America, he awaited action from that quarter. But as the death of Anne terminated that commission and left nothing accomplished, Spotswood took up the question personally.

¹ Va. E. B. C. O. 5/1364, B. T. to Spotswood, June 1, 1716.

² Spotswood Letters, II, 295-298.

Taking advantage of orders from the board of trade for statements of the revenue and to the effect that accounts should be laid before the assembly, he called upon the deputy auditor and deputy receiver for a report on the revenue of Virginia.¹ Based on this, a summary of the system as it had come to be in the early eighteenth century may well be given. As was the case in all provinces, the territorial revenue, consisting of quit rents and other minor charges, was not subject to grant by the assembly. The quit rents were levied at the rate of 1s. or 12 pounds of tobacco for every fifty acres. The Northern Neck was excepted from this rule, and its patents, at the time of which we are speaking, paid annually to the king the very moderate sum of £6.13.4 for the entire grant. In spite of much opposition and slackness in payment, with the growth of the province the revenue from this source gradually increased, amounting at the time of which we are speaking to something like £1500 a year. Virginia was the only colony the quit rents of which were sufficient in amount to admit of a part being paid into the British exchequer. The larger part, however, was retained in the province and used as a surplus for furthering the projects of the crown and of the colonial executive. To no slight degree did this oil the wheels of government and make it possible to carry through policies and conserve executive discretion without unduly antagonizing the burgesses. From no other colony except New York were the quit rents even accounted for to the crown, the reasons being lax administration, various obstacles to collection, and general popular opposition to this form of levy. From this source were also paid £100 annually to the commissary of the bishop of London, £60 yearly to the attorney general and £100 for holding every court of oyer and terminer.

¹ C. O. 5/1316, O. P. Va., Spotswood to B. T. with enclosures, May 24, 1716.

Taxes on land and personalty and on trade were subject to appropriation by the assembly. Among the first, place belonged to the levy of 2s. per hogshead on the export of tobacco. Though this originated just before the Restoration in a grant from the assembly, in 1680 it had been made permanent and, like the similar levy in Maryland, was no longer subject to the chances of temporary grants by the assembly. The annual revenue from this source gradually increased from about £3000 in 1680 to about £7000 in 1760. The other taxes were a tonnage duty, a duty of 6d. per poll for passengers imported, a fee of 5s. for every right to take up 50 acres of land, and occasional temporary levies of impost duties on liquors and slaves.¹ From the permanent appropriated revenue the salary list of the province was paid and other stated claims met. Impost duties were resorted to in order to meet special charges, like the building of the capitol or the governor's house. A general property tax, in the form of a poll tax of 15 or 20 pounds of tobacco on every tithable, also continued regularly to be levied by the assembly to meet province, county and parish expenses. In connection with this the services of the committee on claims was called fully into requisition, and the revenue thus secured went toward paying the wages of burgesses,¹ paying the militia and a large variety of claims for special services. To an extent drafts also were made on other sources of revenue toward paying many of these claims. County and parish levies also took the form of poll taxes, and when added to the province levy they raised the total to about 100 pounds of tobacco per tithable.

¹ The rates on liquors varied from 3d. to 6d. per gallon and on slaves was 15s. or 20s. per head and was intended to be paid by the importer or in part by the master of the importing vessel. Prior to 1710 a duty was also imposed on the importation of servants.

Of the two leading finance officials of the province, the receiver general and the treasurer, the former received the quit rents, the revenue from the export duty on tobacco, the tonnage duty, and all funds which did not come under the care of the treasurer; escheats, forfeitures, fines, payments on taking up rights of land, prize money were accounted for in his office. From it were paid out, on the order of the governor with the advice of the council or orders from the imperial treasury, the salaries of officers of the colony, of the solicitor of Virginia affairs in England, Virginia's share in the salary of the auditor general, and all claims which were not paid from funds in the hands of the treasurer. The treasurer or speaker-treasurer, an appointee of the burgesses, received the revenues arising from the duty on liquors, servants and slaves imported and from public and special levies authorized by vote of the assembly. He accounted to the assembly and paid out funds under order from that body or from the governor. The issue of treasury notes, when occasionally resorted to, was a part of his duties. Both the receiver general and the treasurer were paid in percentages of the revenue which passed through their offices, and the revenues and expenditures of Virginia were audited and with care reported through the auditor general in England.

In the report, above referred to, which was made to Spotswood, it was stated that the 2s. per hogshead, the 6d. per poll on passengers imported and the tonnage duty were collected by the naval officers, also that rent rolls existed by counties, which were made the basis of assessment and collection of quit rents and other levies by sheriffs. Formerly the quit rents had been deposited with the receiver general in Virginia, so that they might be ready when needed, but of late years they had been ordered into the exchequer in England. The revenue was all paid out by warrants of the governor to the receiver general, who half-yearly brought accounts of receipts and expenditures to the auditor with vouchers, and they were passed by him. Three copies of these were made, one being given to the governor, one kept on record in the council office and one sent to the auditor general in England. Contingent charges were also audited and their payment was then ordered.

¹ This was 120 pounds of tobacco per day and travelling expenses. As later commuted into a money payment, it was 9s. or 10s. per day, according as the member came by land or water.

Spotswood criticised this report in some points, as that the composition for escheats was not 2d. per acre but 2 lbs. of tobacco per acre, which, especially in the counties where sweet-scented tobacco was produced, was worth more than 1d. per pound. By that means and by the rating in coin which the receiver general gave to the payments made by the Virginia planters, Spotswood claimed that he made a gain of 13% or more on all the money which he received for escheats. The cost of the courts of oyer and terminer, he also said, was paid not out of the quit rents but out of the 2s. per hogshead. It was also a false notion that the quit rents were drawn into the exchequer, for they remained in the hands of the receiver general until ordered to be paid out in the king's name, and so it had always been. In the matter of naval offices, accounts, composition for escheats and quit rents, the deputy auditor and receiver general did not act as a check upon one another, and that for the reason either they failed to keep adequate accounts or the one official accepted the accounts of the other as certified without examining them.

When, with the general situation as just described in view, Spotswood began to insist that books with complete statements of receipts and payments be kept in all branches of the revenue, he was opposed, especially by Ludwell, the deputy auditor, who plead the custom of his office and the instructions of his superior in England. Ludwell also participated, in a way which was offensive to the governor, in the political agitation which accompanied the session of the assembly in 1715. Therefore, finding him so obstinate that nothing could be accomplished, Spotswood suspended him from office, in May, 1716, and sent charges against him to England.¹

Early the following year a series of fifteen queries, reflecting upon Spotswood's conduct, were presented to the board of trade, and it immediately transmitted them to the governor for his answers.² These related scarcely at all to questions of finance, but to the policy of the governor in the case of the frontier, especially the building of defences at Christanna and Germanna, the settling of Indians, the expenditures for rangers and the plan for a standing militia. Other minor subjects came in for comment, all for the purpose of showing that the governor was oppressive and arbitrary in policy. In answer to these Spotswood reviewed much of his administration and had no difficulty in showing that they were, in all essential particulars, unfounded. In replying to the resolves of the late house of burgesses, which were also presented against him, Spotswood challenged his opponents to show that he had taken any fees or rewards which were not his by right, while he claimed to have endured more labors and exposed himself to more hazards on the frontier than any man in the province. The result of the controversy, in this aspect of it, was that both Ludwell and Byrd were removed from their offices as auditor and receiver general, but whether any permanent improvement followed in the bookkeeping of that department the sources do not reveal.³

Though the relationships of Byrd and Ludwell within the council were extensive, his quarrel with them did not involve the governor in a conflict with that body as such. But another controversy was already developing in which the governor came directly to an issue with the council. That grew out of his efforts to reduce its judicial powers by appointing special commissioners to sit with the council in courts of oyer and terminer. This was not only in harmony with a law of which the governor had secured the passage in 1710,⁴ but with the general authority to establish courts which was given to royal governors in their instructions. Spots-

¹ Spotswood Letters, II, 150, 152, 159, 175-187.

² Ibid., 190 et seq.

³ Ibid., 174, 248.

⁴ Hening, III, 489; Bassett, op. cit., LXVIII.

wood's justification for his measures was that, since the members of the council were so inter-related by descent or marriage, and since the law required that judges should retire from the bench when cases involving members of their family were to be tried, it was desirable that the court should be differently constituted. When, in 1712, a man was to be tried for his life, Spotswood appointed two of the leading men of the colony to assist the court of oyer and terminer which tried him. But the members of that body, considering themselves the only stated court for criminal causes, looked on this as an invasion of their privileges and refused to act as councillors until the grievance was redressed. Without abandoning his claim, Spotswood then withdrew the new appointments until he should receive instructions from England.

The controversy now extended to the burgesses, and they designated Byrd as agent and sent an address to the king in which, among other things, they supported the contention of the council.¹ Thus he was regularly empowered as agent of council and burgesses and diligently presented the case of both in England. The board of trade, from the beginning, was unanimous in the opinion that the governor had the right to establish courts and appoint judges without limiting himself to members of the council. Later, in 1717, the case was referred to the attorney general, and in an elaborate opinion he sustained the contention of the governor. The board then reported these facts to the king and stated in addition that Byrd did not question the power itself but only desired that it should be restrained, as being specially liable to abuse; but as the governor was answerable for his conduct and as the application did not come from the people of Virginia, but from the councillors who seemed to be claiming power for themselves to the prejudice of the prerogative, it thought that the governor's commission should hold good.² With this decision, though unwillingly and under continuous

¹ J. of B., May 24 and 30, 1718. One of the arguments which Byrd submitted to the board of trade, setting forth his fear that the governor would secure too much power if he should appoint the judges, is printed in Palmer's Calendar of Va. State Papers, I, 191.

² C. O. 5/1365, Va. E. B. Dec. 31, 1717, and Mar. 3, 1717/18; C. O. 5/1318. O. P. Va., 1717-1718; C. O. 5/1412, J. of Ex. C. Va. Oct. 27, 1716, Dec. 9, 1718; Spotswood Letters, II, 25, 221, 224.

pressure from Spotswood, the council in Virginia acquiesced. The feeling between the Byrd-Ludwell-Blair connection and the governor had by this time become intense. The governor had called Blair a "very ill man" and had made a somewhat violent speech at a meeting of the visitors of the college. In his letters home he was also complaining bitterly of the opposition which he was meeting from these eight councillors and their connections throughout Virginia.

In the course of the election of 1718 a paper, called an "Advice to the freeholders of the several Counties of Virginia in the choice of Representatives to serve in the approaching Assembly," was circulated through the province. Spotswood inferred that it was written by a member of the council, and presumably he meant Ludwell. In this paper the freeholders were urged not to choose representatives who were favorable to the governor and to the group connected with the projected Indian company, who desired an appropriation to pay their charges at Fort Christanna and otherwise to cheat the people. The governor and his supporters, it was said, desired the province to take that fort under its care and man it at a cost of 100,000 pounds of tobacco per year. Creatures, favorites and tools of the governor were trampling down liberty, and the last assembly was abused for upholding the interests of the country against such perils; let no favorites be chosen this time, was the advice. Of course it was not followed and the temper of the assembly, which was now elected, was milder than that of its predecessor.¹

When the assembly met, Spotswood sought to counteract such attacks by dwelling on the peace and prosperity of the province, as compared with the debts with which its southern neighbors were harassed as the result of their Indian wars. He told the assembly that they had met not to appropriate supplies for defence, but to find out the best way to dispose of "the greatest Bank of money that ever was at one time in the Public Treasury of Virginia."² During the session efforts were made by certain neutral members of the council to bring about a reconciliation between the governor and their colleagues. Byrd in England was also trying to induce the titular governor, the earl of Orkney, to aid in this work. Spotswood professed to be cooperating, and many glasses of punch were consumed by the parties in the effort to come to terms, though without much result. Spotswood remarked at the end that none of the eight councillors would pay him the civility of a visit, but on one occasion, when he was giving a public entertainment, got up a meeting of their own where healths were drunk, though not to the governor, and liquor was passed round to the people outside who were gathered about a bonfire.

¹ C. O. 5/1318, O. P. Va. Apr. 24, 1717; Spotswood Letters, II, 276.

² This amounted to about £15,000 and was due to the impost on an unusually flourishing tobacco trade.

No specially important laws were enacted during this session, and on the surface relations between the governor and the burgesses appeared to be reasonably harmonious. But the discontented councillors and their supporters, in and out of the assembly, were active and a number of controversial subjects were mooted, though they were not allowed to assume the first place.¹ As the result of the presentation of grievances from six counties, an act was passed—the only legislation of public importance—specifying the fees of the secretary, sheriffs, coroners, constables, and clerks of the county courts, as well as those of attorneys. A proposal was also introduced to put £4,000 of the public money into the hands of Archibald Blair, a brother of the commissary, to be kept, as Spotswood supposed, for such uses as the clique, of which the Blairs were members, might desire. Spotswood also remarked that Ludwell and the Blairs were partners in one of the largest trading stores in the province. It can be readily understood why no bill on this subject reached the hands of the governor; it illustrated the danger which lurked in a surplus.

One of the measures of this session, which was aimed at the prerogative, was embodied in a clause that the assembly desired to tack to the fee bill, providing that the secretary should no longer appoint clerks of the county courts, but that they should hold during the pleasure of the elected justices of those courts. This received much support, the argument being used that the clerks in question were often elected as burgesses and, if they were removable by an officer of the king's appointment, it gave the governor too much power over them. Spotswood interpreted this as akin to a proposal made in the last assembly, that all office holders should be excluded from the lower house; and as he had declared that if the clause was kept in the bill he would veto the entire measure, it was dropped. Another bill, which was dropped before it reached Spotswood, was intended to exclude the colonial postmaster from meddling with any sea-going letters and to hamper him otherwise in the discharge of his duties. This was the result of an outcry which was now raised in Virginia on the occasion of the first attempt to establish a regular mail route between Williamsburg and Philadelphia, to specify rates of postage, the times and places for the receipt and delivery of letters and other necessary regulations. As this was done under the authority of an act of parliament, it was said that the rates of postage were a tax, which parliament had not the right to impose nor the postmaster to collect. Complaints were presented to the assembly against the post office and a bill passed both houses which, though it acknowledged the act of parliament to be in force in Virginia, by the provisions just alluded to sought to prevent its execution.

¹ Spotswood Letters, II, 275–295; Journal of Burgesses, 1712–1726, pp. 173–217.

The assembly also refused to pay the expense of the Indian school at Christanna and of the guard and fort there. They advised that the Indian hostages who were kept to secure peace be sent back. As they were not informed of any irregularities in the Indian trade, they were indifferent as to keeping up the regulations. The point was also made by the house that, as Spotswood's plan of forming a barrier of tributary Indian tribes had failed to attract any but the Saponies, there was no use in continuing the fort at Christanna or other features of his policy.¹ At the close of this session Spotswood spoke little, but in his letters to the board he poured forth his bitter criticism of the situation into which the opposition councillors through their influence over the burgesses had brought the province. He considered that his cherished plans had been defeated and his only resource for the time was to ask for the removal of Byrd from the council because of his long absence in Europe, and to enlarge upon the ambiguous position of councillors, arising from the fact that they acted for the people of the colonies as well as servants of the king. Though it was not openly avowed, in Spotswood's opinion this idea had taken root in the minds of too many councillors and made them unfaithful to the crown.

¹ J. of Burgesses, ibid., 207, 213. Spotswood Letters, II, 281 et seq.

In the November session of 1718, after another controversy over the right of the governor to collate to benefices in the church had been provoked by Blair and Ludwell, the issue between Spotswood and the burgesses reached its culmination. At the beginning the session was tranquil and it was expected to be short, because there seemed to be nothing of importance to do except to pass the public levy.¹ But on the ninth day, after, according to Spotswood, several of the less trusted members had gone home, an address to the king was adopted, charging that the governor had perverted the laws, especially those relating to land grants; that he had exceeded appropriations in expenditures on his house; that he had tried to prevent the county justices from levying the salaries settled by law upon the burgesses, and that he had abused the burgesses by provoking messages and speeches. Byrd, as agent, was ordered to present this address, and in the first draft of his instructions several other charges were included, but they were dropped. At the outset it was intended by some expressly to demand the governor's removal, but that also was softened into an expression of discontent at being governed by a lieutenant governor.

But even this mild impeachment, when the governor was informed of it, furnished him the occasion for a speech at the close of the session which was framed in his loftiest style.² Though he did call the burgesses "a Cataline crew of malcontents," his tone in general was that of a patriot who, while laboring successfully to bring the province to a high state of prosperity, had been wantonly attacked. But this was only the beginning of his defence. A detailed answer to the charges in the address was sent to England, and to show that the province was with him, he secured favorable addresses from twenty-one out of twenty-five counties, from a convention of the clergy, from the grand jury of the colony and from a number of the burgesses.¹ As before, Spotswood traced the origin of the charges to his opponents in the council. His regulations as to the payment of quit rent was the source of their irritation. They were the ruling oligarchs, controlled the vestries and counties, obstructed the collection of the revenue when they chose, and insisted that the governor must yield to them and not criticise their doings. It was the same aristocratic clique of Virginia which had caused the failure of the administrations of Andros and Nicholson. To the student of the politics of the time great interest also attaches to Spotswood's idea of the burgesses, as expressed in his defence against the charge that he had discouraged the collection of their salaries. He said that he had been instructed to keep these at a moderate rate, as their last three sessions had cost 800,000 pounds of tobacco and they had passed only one public act which would stand as law. This the governor considered "an unreasonable Burthen." Their large salaries of more than thirty shillings per day were a great incentive to inferior men to seek election. As all freeholders could vote, the inferior class among them were worked upon by ambitious candidates, and low practices were resorted to, so that those who had nothing to lose carried their points. "These upon an approaching election, set themselves to inventing most false and malicious stories and industriously spread them about the country to poison the minds of the people and prejudice them against such candidates as should seem most worthy in the eye of the government, and as they are the familiar companions of the common planters, they have continued opportunities to propagate the scandalous reports and absurd notions among the vulgar." Mobbist politicians, who engaged to pursue the wild schemes of the electors and who withstood all demands of the government, pass for patriots with the multitude. They thrust themselves into the legislature in order to make a larger crop of tobacco at the capital than they could on their own plantations. This, like the utterances of Hunter, well expresses the views of an eighteenth-century conservative concerning colonial assemblies, and that it contains much truth concerning these bodies, and indeed concerning legislatures in all times, no one can deny. In Spotswood's opinion, all friends of the British constitution must long to see a check put to the growth of these evils. His remedy and that of the board of trade, as expressed, for example, in its letter of April 23, 1713,¹ was the simple one of raising the property qualification for the suffrage. But it was found that neither the council nor the lower house would tolerate this, and Spotswood had to content himself with further complaints of the intractable temper of the Virginia planters.

¹ Spotswood Letters, II, 306, 308 et seq.; J. of B. ibid., 228 et seq.; C. O. 5/1318, O. P. Nov. 1718, March 1719.

² J. of B., loc. cit., p. 243.

¹ Spotswood Letters, II, 311-316, 320; C. O. 5/1318.

This was the end of serious controversy during Spotswood's administration. Two years passed before the assembly was again called together. Then he told them that, if vulgar notions did not prevail to the effect that the body should oppose the head, or invidious distinctions arise between the friends of the governor and the friends of the country, assemblies would undoubtedly be most wholesome parts of the constitution. As he had then decided to spend the rest of his life in Virginia, they no longer had reason, he said, to suspect him of designs against its welfare. He looked upon her "as a Rib taken from Britain's Side," but he warned her that "this Eve must thrive so long as her Adam flourishes, and if she allowed any serpent to tempt her to go astray it would but multiply her sorrow and quicken her husband to rule more strictly over her."² The use of this figure to express what he regarded as the relation between the colony and the realm makes this utterance of the Virginia governor comparable with John Winthrop's "little speech" at the close of his famous trial in Puritan Massachusetts.³ But the sentiment and spirit of the two utterances are notable by way of contrast rather than resemblance, for the Virginia governor took credit for most of the good that was done, and sought to make everything centre about himself and the crown of which he was the representative. The conciliatory sentiments of the governor, however, were fully reciprocated by the burgesses. Peace had already been made in the council and Byrd was restored to his seat in that body. Its members abandoned their exclusive claim to the place of judges in the courts of oyer and terminer.¹ The question of the governor's right to collate to benefices was referred to the privy council for settlement. Spotswood gave over into the hands of appointees of the burgesses the principal charge of the completion of his house and grounds.² Among the laws passed this session were several which authorized the dividing of counties and parishes and thus satisfied a need upon which Spotswood had insisted at the beginning of his administration.

¹ C. O. 5/1363, E. B. Va.

² J. of B., loc. cit., 250, 254.

³ Osgood, Am. Colonies in the 17th century, I, 199.

With the reopening, for a brief period, of war between England and Spain privateers began to infest the Virginia coast. These continued after the suspension of arms, and gave an opportunity for Virginia again to assume a rôle in affairs which affected all the southern colonies alike.³ She sent Captain John Martin, with an armed sloop as a flag of truce, to St. Augustine to protect and obtain restitution, if possible, for the damage which the Spanish had inflicted. Some Spanish prisoners were restored on board this vessel. Martin's sloop was lost on the bar at St. Augustine, and the governor there disclaimed responsibility for the attacks of privateers; but two small English vessels were restored. These conditions gave rise to complaints that the guardships absented themselves too much, pleading stress of weather as an excuse for sailing away to New York or Barbadoes, and a demand from the general assembly that larger vessels be sent to Virginia and that their captains be ordered not to depart without the governor's permission.

On the appointment of an agent in England and the instructions which should be given him the lower house disagreed with both the governor and the council; hence that project fell through.⁴ Neither did Spotswood succeed in inducing the assembly to reimburse the members of the late Indian company for its expenditures in the public service.

The question of most wide-reaching importance which in-

¹ C. O. 5/1412, Dec. 9, 1718; Spotswood Letters, II, 335, 341; Cal. of Va. State Papers, I, 195.

² J. of B., loc. cit., 284.

³ Ibid., 303; Spotswood Letters, II, 341, 347.

⁴ J. of B., loc. cit., 308-310, 313.

terested the province and especially its governor during the last two years of Spotswood's administration was that of the progress of French influence in the valley of the Mississippi and its bearing upon Indian relations, as well as upon English interests in general. In this connection mention should be made of the push of settlement westward toward the mountains and the erection in 1720 of the two new counties of Spotsylvania and Brunswick.¹ This act followed quickly on the adjustment of the North Carolina boundary and contained in its preamble, as the reason for its passage, the statement that the frontier toward the high mountains was exposed to danger from the Indians and the French. The object of the measure was to secure the two passes through the Blue Ridge, the one near the upper waters of the Rappahannock and the other near those of the Roanoke. The two counties comprised large and loosely bounded areas, the one at the northwest and the other at the southwest extremity of the province. Settlers in these regions, including the foreign born, were encouraged by exemption from public levies for ten years, which provision was made for supplying them at the public expense with arms and ammunition and for the building of a church and court house in Spotsylvania county. Until local government should be fully established in the new jurisdictions, magistrates of the neighboring counties should attend to the maintenance of the peace among the new settlers. An address was sent to the king urging that a fort be built at each of the passes and garrisoned with one hundred men, all to be supported out of the Virginia quit rents or in some other form from the royal exchequer. It was in Spotsylvania that the governor was specially interested, for to mining projects and the production of naval stores in that region he was already committing himself and there he was to spend the years which remained to him after the close of his governorship. Some interesting proofs also of his activity in procuring land grants in the new county, using dummy grantees for the purpose and thereby increasing his possessions by many thousand acres, came to light in the course of the next few years. The stationing of royal troops on that frontier could not at this early date be generally regarded as a necessity, and the only concession which was obtained from the crown was a remission of the payment of quit rents and purchase money by settlers in these counties for seven years after the passage of the act for their establishment. No person should take up more than one thousand acres in either of the two counties and the conditions of seating and cultivating should be the same as elsewhere. Finally, none who held land in other parts of Virginia should take up land in these counties without at least giving security for the payment of quit rent for the land they already held.¹

¹ Henning, IV, 77; J. of B., loc. cit., 289 et seq.

The need of a revision and extension of Indian treaties, especially with the Iroquois, was already evident and from 1720 it was frequently before the Virginia assembly. Apart from the general causes for this which have just been alluded to, attention was drawn to the subject by occasional raids across the Virginia frontier, which were occasioned by the feud between the Iroquois and the Catawbias and other tribes to the south. These were the subject of correspondence with New York and of legislation by Virginia early in 1722 to the effect that neither its tributary Indians nor those belonging to the Five Nations should pass to the east of the Blue Ridge or to the south of the Potomac river, without license and passports from the governors of the respective colonies to which they belonged.² Supported by this law, Spotswood visited Albany the following summer and joined in a notable Indian conference. It was the last event of his administration and served as a fitting close of what had been a leading phase of its policy. The history of the conference belongs to that of Indian relations in general, and with this brief reference both it and the administration of Spotswood in Virginia will be for the present dismissed.

¹ C. O. 5/1319 B. T. O. P. O. in C., Aug. 6, 1723. The able letter of the board of trade to Lord Carteret on this subject shows that it favored the building of forts and even the stationing of troops in these counties at the expense of the crown. C. O. 5/1365, B. T. E. B. July 17, 1721.

² Hening, IV, 103. J. of Burgesses, loc. cit., 286, 300, 351, 352.

CHAPTER XXIV

PENNSYLVANIA FROM THE ISSUE OF THE CHARTER OF PRIVILEGES TO THE GOVERNORSHIP OF WILLIAM KEITH, 1701-1717

PENNSYLVANIA, among all the colonies, was the largest recipient of immigrants from the continent of Europe in the eighteenth century. These added a large German component to its inhabitants and, with the later Scotch-Irish immigration, made its population as heterogeneous as that of New York. But this movement and its effects did not become very pronounced until subsequent to the date with which this chapter closes. Therefore, for the present, we are to consider Pennsylvania as inhabited very largely by people of English descent, with a mixture of Welsh and a certain Dutch and Swedish element along Delaware river and bay. It was through the connection with the Lower Counties that the Dutch and Swedes find their place in Pennsylvania history. Considered from the standpoint of religion, the great majority of the English inhabitants of Pennsylvania still were Quakers. But there was a small, though active, Anglican element in Philadelphia and at a few other points, which received support from the Jerseys and especially from Anglicans who lived in the Lower Counties. The province, therefore, was being managed by Quakers and such controversies or other difficulties as there were arose among them, though they were in some cases increased by the presence of Anglicans, by contact with people down the bay and by relations with the home government. War and the extension of imperial control were the occasion of many perplexities for the Quaker, while questions of trade and of the Lower Counties were involved with the Maryland boundary dispute and conflicting claims to territory and proprietary revenue. The provinces about the Delaware and Chesapeake were bound together in a network of relations, at the centre of which stood Pennsylvania.

For a little more than a decade after his return to England in 1701, William Penn retained his accustomed vigor and activity. During that time his influence was felt in all affairs which concerned his province and his sect, whether in America or in Europe. He left James Logan as his efficient agent in Pennsylvania, with whom he was always in correspondence touching the survey or sale of lands, the collection of proprietary revenue, the management of manors or other estates, a settlement for the daughter of his first marriage, the conduct of his eldest son, and all the varied matters of private and family interest. In addition to these, Penn and Logan were continually exchanging views concerning political questions which agitated or in any way affected Pennsylvania. In this correspondence,¹ which fulfilled a purpose similar to that which passed between the governors of a royal province and the board of trade or secretary of state, Logan in particular discussed from the point of view of proprietary interests all public questions. His powerful and logical mind was unsparing in its analysis of political situations and of public characters. Logan also was not sparing of advice to Penn, and it was usually based on thorough knowledge and sound judgment. He was the proprietor's valued minister as well as private agent—a mingling of functions which was characteristic of the proprietary system—and his letters were far more voluminous and important than any which passed between the governors of the time and the proprietor. They contain indeed a body of fact and criticism such as no other proprietary province can show, and one which it would be difficult to match among the archives of the colonial period as a whole. In this correspondence, so far as political questions are concerned, the part borne by Penn was decidedly secondary and inferior, and, in reading it, one wonders why Logan was not appointed governor. As it was, he was only a member of the board of property, secretary and a member of the council.

William Penn was a man with multifarious interests and

¹ A part of this, included between the years 1700 and 1709, was published years ago, in two volumes, by the Hist. Soc. of Pa. But Logan's letter books still exist in manuscript, in the possession of that Society, extending in unbroken series until after 1730.

connections, religious, social, political and of a business nature, which extended not only to America and to all parts of the United Kingdom and Ireland, but to Holland and Germany as well. Though born into the burgher class, his social affiliations had extended among people of all ranks and many nationalities. Not only had he been welcomed and consulted at the court of the Stuarts, but he had repeatedly suffered imprisonment for his faith. As a Quaker preacher he had journeyed with Fox and Keith, and his writings on Quakerism and liberty were widely read in many circles. He was an international character of the first rank in his generation, and the duration of his life was such as to connect him with the Restoration at the one limit and with the accession of the Hanoverians at the other. A man with such a record and character it is manifestly difficult to locate or classify. He was not a lawyer, nor a statesman, nor a systematic business man. And yet he was always immersed in affairs, private and public, and while he was often charged with greed and craft, his usual attitude toward the world was that of a benevolent idealist. He preferred to be regarded as the father of his province rather than its proprietor in the narrow and legal sense of the term. Concessions he made at the outset were inconsistent with safe administrative rules; and a certain carelessness and lack of system appearing in all his public dealings, while they opened the way to greater freedom, led to misunderstandings and disputes. His place among proprietors was unique, as it was in many other relations. Unlike the Calverts, during his life he received no assistance from relatives in the administration of his province, while his selections of men from outside to be governors were conspicuously unwise. While the province was small and he was present in it, his influence was very great. By mutual concessions all went well. But after his final return to England criticism began. He lost his veto forever. His influence over his governors was slight. While for several years he was active before the board of trade and elsewhere in England as a defender of proprietary rights against royal or parliamentary assaults, his connection with the province was kept up through Logan more than through the ordinary official channels. Finally, as the result of certain untoward circumstances, his influence upon government in Pennsylvania was so reduced as to become, years before his death, a memory rather than a reality. For a time Pennsylvania was nearly as free from the control of its proprietor as were the Carolinas at the same period.

The chief cause of this collapse in Penn's fortunes was his reckless dealings, extending over years, with Philip Ford and his wife. His good nature and unbusinesslike habits had made it possible for them to weave a network of fraud about him. Ford, who was a Quaker and a London merchant, had first been appointed by Penn steward of his Irish estates. About the time of Penn's first voyage to America, in 1682, Ford presented to him an account in which it was made to appear that Penn was indebted to him to the amount of £2851. So absorbed was the proprietor in his many schemes, and so trustful, that shortly afterward Ford secured his signature to a deed of lease and release according to which this debt was increased to £3000 and Penn must pay this or grant Ford 300,000 acres of land in Pennsylvania. This was but the beginning of a long series of fraudulent transactions, in which Ford and his wife played upon the credulity and carelessness of the proprietor till they had made it appear that he was indebted to them to the amount of more than £20,000. A variety of mortgages and deeds of conveyance of the province and territories were also secretly drawn and signed as security for the payment of these sums. Exorbitant rates of interest were also charged by the Fords. In 1697, after Penn had granted to them an absolute release of province and territories, giving up to them the royal charter and deeds of enfeoffment, Ford leased them back to Penn for a profitable consideration, the proprietor hoping thereby to escape the payment of a tax levied in England on borrowed money.

By 1702 Penn had become hopelessly involved for an amount far beyond his ability to pay. He had appealed to some of his Quaker friends to help him out, and finally to the London Meeting. But receiving no adequate assistance, he was forced, in 1705, to proceed against the heirs of Ford by a bill in chancery. In this Penn failed because he had signed so many accounts, deeds and settlements, all apparently in good faith, that the chancellor refused to have the accounts inspected, however unreasonable they might be. The Fords then, in 1706, appointed Isaac Norris, David Lloyd and John Moore, who were supposed to be Penn's greatest enemies, to receive all the quit rents and sell all proprietary lands in the province and territories. Norris refused to serve and went to England to help straighten out affairs; but the financial condition of the proprietor now became pretty well known in the province. The Fords also instituted a suit in the common pleas against Penn for arrears of rent due since 1697 and obtained a verdict for nearly £300. It was because of his inability to pay this that he was arrested and imprisoned for debt in the Fleet.

¹ Shepherd, Proprietary Government in Pennsylvania (Columbia University Studies, VI), 185 et seq.

The Fords now appealed directly to the queen to transfer to them the land and government of the province. But Sir Edward Northey showed that the deeds gave no power of government, that no decree had yet issued from the chancery and the property was not alienated. Finding their plans thwarted at this point, the Fords became more inclined to compromise and, after prolonged negotiations, in return for £7,600 they executed a deed of release in October, 1708. A large part of this sum certain merchants, among whom were Henry Gouldney and Joshua Gee, subscribed on Penn's behalf and he in return mortgaged the province to trustees. They then empowered Logan and others to collect debts and quit rents, sell lands and manage Penn's property there. In this way things again fell back within the control of the proprietor and his friends.¹ But his prestige had greatly suffered and the mortgage which now rested upon the province was a perpetual badge of his weakness. How this affected the question of the surrender of the province to the crown will appear later.

While Penn was becoming involved in these difficulties of a private nature, his experiment in Pennsylvania was confronted by numerous perplexing questions. War inevitably brought difficulties to a Quaker government. It was accompanied with increased emphasis upon imperial control and this threatened the permanence of all chartered colonies.

¹ Many references to the Ford business are in the Penn-Logan Correspondence, II, 200 et seq.

Reference has already been made to ways in which it menaced Pennsylvania. With this went the growth of Anglicanism in and about the Quaker province and the increase of those, among its own population and in adjacent provinces, who did not sympathize with its ideals. People of this character were especially numerous in the lower counties, and this section of Penn's domain lay in the centre of a network of complex relations, of which the boundary dispute with Maryland formed an important part.¹ The Marylanders were claiming the entire region under the provision of the royal charter of 1632 which specified the fortieth degree of latitude as their northern boundary, but ignoring the qualification that at the time of its grant the territory in question had been temporarily settled by the Dutch, that soon after it was permanently occupied by Swedes and Dutch, that their colonies then passed by conquest to the English, and later by a complicated series of grants the territory had come into the possession of Penn and had been annexed to Pennsylvania. But the government of Maryland was now in the hands of the crown, the English church was in process of establishment there, illegal trade was rife on the lower Delaware, and it was easily conceivable that the British government would not be indifferent to the Baltimore claim. Now that the government of the Jerseys had been surrendered, the surrender of the lower counties to the crown or their transfer to Maryland would give the queen control over both shores of the bay. But if that occurred, Pennsylvania would be isolated and its port, Philadelphia, cut off from free access to the coast.

The possession of the lower counties was therefore of great importance to Pennsylvania, and by an act of union, passed in 1682 and intended to confirm the indenture from the duke of York the same year,² they were united with the province, it being provided that the two should have the same assembly and executive, should be governed by the same laws and share equally in all benefits. But Penn's claim to this territory was by no means clear. It was contested by the British government and offered a vulnerable point which Randolph and Quarry were not slow to attack.³ Its population also was largely of foreign origin and largely of faiths alien to his own. It was not strange, then, that soon after the passage of the act of union signs of dissatisfaction began to appear. Though there was danger that the lower counties might be annexed by Maryland, the chance of that was remote and it did not serve to deter the dissatisfied from action against Pennsylvania. To the other causes of divergence commercial rivalry between Newcastle and Philadelphia now developed. The complaint first made by the counties was that Pennsylvania vessels did not enter and clear at the port lower down the bay. Soon the counties began also to complain that they were unequally represented in the provincial council and among the judges. Procedure and decisions of the courts were criticised. Action by the council affecting the counties, unless an adequate number of members from that section was present, was opposed. The lodgment of a large appointing power in the hands of a governor, who was a province man, occasioned dissatisfaction.

¹ Shepherd, op. cit., 117 et seq.

² Hazard, Annals of Pa., 611.

³ Kellogg, Am. Colonial Charter, Report of Am. Hist. Assoc., 1903, I, 244.

The lower counties were more exposed to attack than was the province, and the attitude of the Quakers toward war was not widely shared by their people. Therefore, when alarms spread and the need of ports and a militia was felt, agitation and action on these matters followed similar to what occurred among the colonies at large. The silent refusal of the province to take action in these concerns provoked resentment in the counties and led to disturbances at elections and refusal to choose representatives. Complaints from the counties of the defenceless condition along the Delaware were made to Penn and he was requested to inform the king.

Still another and a very important element in the situation arose from the fact that there was comparatively little room for the expansion of settlement and increase of population within the limits of the counties, while in the province there was space for a very large growth. The province already considered itself the superior of the two, so that it was felt that acts which were passed when the assembly was in session at Newcastle were not to be obeyed without confirmation at Philadelphia. In 1701, shortly before the close of the last visit of the proprietor, he held a conference with the members over this question and expressed his grief at the prospect of a rupture. But when the members from the lower counties expressed the firm conviction that the union was an unequal one, Penn, with the paternal regard which so distinguished him from all other proprietors, told them they were free to go and might act by themselves if they wished, but it must be upon amicable terms and a due settlement of the legal relations between themselves and the province.¹ "Yield in circumstantialia to preserve essentials." With this the members who were present from the lower counties expressed themselves as well pleased. A proviso was then added by Penn to the Charter of Privileges² that if, within three years, the province and counties should agree to separate, the three counties of the former should be represented in an assembly of their own by eight members each, besides two from Philadelphia, and each of the three counties in the territories by such a number as they chose. This provision, in the state of feeling which had come to exist, as good as assured the separation of the assemblies, and it came very promptly after the return of the proprietor to England.

The counties refused to accept the Charter of Privileges and sent no representatives to the assembly of October, 1702. The members from the province at once requested that they might organize separately.³ Governor Hamilton submitted several arguments against this course, which showed that the question had bearings much wider than the local interests of the parties concerned. After calling attention to the fact that the tobacco which was exported from the Delaware region was raised chiefly in the lower counties, and if they were separated it would hinder that traffic, he referred them to papers lately come from England which showed that Randolph and Quarry were advocating the separation of the territories in the hope that they might come directly under the crown. If that was accomplished, access from the province to the sea might be hindered and proprietary government there be ultimately overthrown. But these arguments produced little or no effect. The Quakers of the province were as ready for separation as was the mixed population of the counties. Both were ready to take advantage even of technicalities for the purpose, as that the election had been held under the charter of liberties in the one section and under writs in the other and therefore that they could not sit together. The result was that a joint assembly was not held during Hamilton's brief administration, and in the session which was held after his death the province only was represented and that by eight members from each county as was provided in the charter of liberties to be the number, if separation should occur. Meantime Penn's title to the lower counties had been declared unsatisfactory in England and confirmation of his lieutenant governors could be secured only by his signing an article, stating that the crown reserved the right to resume government over them.

¹ Col. Recs., II, 51, 52.

² Ibid., 60.

³ Votes, I, App., XV, et seq.; Col. Recs., II, 72 et seq. A recent account of these events is in Keith, Chronicles of Pa., 411.

On the arrival of Governor Evans, in 1704, he ordered the election of four representatives from each of the lower counties and brought them into a conference with the council and the representatives of the province. He urged upon them the desirability of continuing the union and his orders to uphold it.¹ But the province stood out, the technical point as to the number of representatives from the counties being urged as sufficient at this stage to decide the question, and it was found impossible to hold a joint assembly.² No later effort was made to bring them together, and the province and counties continued to be governed by a common executive but with distinct assemblies. They also continued under the same judicial system until the issue of the ordinance of 1706 for the establishment of courts.

Logan³ watched the growth of Anglicanism in the counties as contributing to the separation, and Governor Evans, as a result of his quarrel with the Quakers, was believed to favor the handing of them over to the crown. In 1715 the earl of Sutherland petitioned the king for the grant of the counties in payment of a debt due him from the crown. Their inhabitants, fearing that their property rights might be imperilled, then sought complete reunion with Pennsylvania, but the offer was rejected, and, except for the occasion this gave for some efforts on the part of Governor Keith to discriminate against Quakers in the counties, no change resulted. Inasmuch as by this result the access of Pennsylvania to the sea might be obstructed and the way be left open to efforts on the part of Maryland to absorb the lower counties, the outcome could not be considered advantageous to Penn's province. On the other hand, it was in harmony with the natural inclination of the Quakers toward seclusion and quietude, and their avoidance of questions which might force them to sacrifice their ideals. With this tendency the Germans, who were already settling in the interior of the province, were quite in sympathy.

¹ B. T. Proprieties.

² Col. Recs., II, 125-131; Kellogg, op. cit., 245.

³ Penn-Logan Correspondence, I, 191, 267, 282, etc.; Shepherd, 347.

We have already seen ² that in the Frames of Government at the outset concessions were granted in Pennsylvania which made its system complicated and obscured the rights of the proprietor and his execution. Clear definition of rights, as well as consistent practice, was needed if that system was to be worked without friction. But clear definition Penn and those associated with him did not furnish.

The Charter of Privileges of 1701 furnishes a good illustration of the crudity of Penn's attempts to draft what was intended to be a sort of written constitution of the province.² It contained clauses about a number of minor subjects which should have found their place in ordinary statutes, and wholly failed to mention others which were of prime importance to government and about which, since they were omitted, disputes were bound to arise. One of these was the right of veto. By the royal charter this was guarantied to the crown, an obligation which was not imposed on any other chartered colony of the seventeenth century. Under the first Frame of Government the governor, as distinct from the proprietor, did not possess the right of veto, and in the Frame of 1683 no reference was made to it, though the fact that he was deprived of his three votes in the council may lead to the inference that he then possessed it.³ During Fletcher's administration and under Markham's Frame of Government the right of assent and dissent was fully enjoyed by the governor. In the Charter of Privileges no reference was made to it and the governors thereafter continued to exercise it as a right effectually guarantied by earlier practice.

¹ Osgood, American Colonies in the 17th Century, II, Chap. 11.

² Logan's account of its origin is to be found in his "Memorial in behalf of the Proprietor's Family and of himself, Servant of that Family," which was written in 1725 in reply to William Keith; Votes, II, 419.

³ Shepherd, op. cit., 239, 251; Works of Franklin (Sparks' ed.) III, 173.

But as yet nothing had been said about the proprietor's right of veto, and it is impossible to tell whether or not, when out of the province, he had exercised it. When, however, he commissioned Evans, a clause was inserted reserving to himself this right. That would have placed the legislation of Pennsylvania under a threefold veto, a badge of dependence such as was worn by no other colony. In a conference between the council and assembly, in May, 1704, the latter protested against¹ this claim as one which was not contemplated in the royal charter. As the proprietor was now in England, the inconveniences attending its enforcement would be so great as practically to defeat the objects of legislation. After consideration the council agreed with the assembly that, when the governor had affixed the great seal of the province to an act it could not be annulled by the proprietor without the assent of the assembly. They held that this requirement could be dropped from the governor's commission without destroying the validity of that document, while of course the right of veto would still remain in the king as provided in the royal charter. This view was confirmed by an opinion of Attorney General Northey, in October, 1705, to the effect that the proprietor could exercise the right of assent or dissent when he was in the province; action of this kind by his deputy in his absence was complete and final.² We may infer that in this way one of the vetoes to which Pennsylvania laws had been exposed was eliminated. The act of the proprietor's agent, his governor, must thereafter suffice.

Another question, which was not expressly answered by the Charter of Privileges, was that of the share of the council in legislation. At the time of its issue an appointive council permanently took the place of the elective one and, as a result of this, the council ceased to be a legislative body. But no reference whatever appeared to this fact in the document itself, nor in the commission then issued to the council were its powers so defined as clearly to exclude that of legislation.¹ The documents left it to be a matter of inference from the practice which followed. Is it any wonder that disputes arose? The council at once began to advise the governor in reference to his action on bills sent up by the assembly. He considered these bills in sessions of the council. It thus came by this indirect method practically to exercise legislative powers—under the guise of advice to the governor. When, in the August session of 1704, they were amending a bill for the confirmation of the Charter² of Privileges, the assembly resolved that it was inconsistent with the said charter that the council should have a share in legislation except when, on the death of a governor, the entire power of government resided in that body. They also questioned whether the governor should approve laws during sessions of the council.

¹ Col. Recs., II, 144, 146. David Lloyd's account of the attitude of the assembly toward this is in Penn-Logan Correspondence, II, 405.

² Stats. at Large of Pa., II, 475.

A third question, which also caused much discussion, was that of the right of the assembly to adjourn itself. This had been conceded to it in the Frames of Government, but without the necessary limitations. Respecting these limitations Penn wrote in 1710: "I designed³ the people should be secured of their annual fixed election and Assembly; and . . . that they should sit on their own adjournments; but to strain this expression to a power to meet at all times during the year without the governor's concurrence would be to distort government, to break the due proportion of the parts of it, to establish confusion in the place of necessary order and to make the legislative the executive part of government." Accordingly, following the practice in other provinces, when Penn appointed Evans governor, in 1703, he ordered him to call, prorogue and dissolve assemblies. The Charter of Privileges, however, contained nothing decisive on this question, and owing to this omission and to the issue of an instruction which seemed to conflict with the earlier Frames of Government, the conditions were created out of which a dispute was bound to arise. In its bill of August, 1704, the assembly sought to regulate its sessions by amending and confirming the Charter of Privileges. When this came before Evans,¹ he told them he perceived from it that they were trying to assume fully the power of adjournment and to exclude him from the right given in his commission and instructions. The assembly replied that the exercise of these powers would defeat the plan of annual elections provided for in the Charter and would substitute writs issued at the discretion of the executive. Following the advice of the council in which on this question the voice of Judge Mompesson was the weightiest, the governor expressed the opinion that the proprietor had not granted away the power under discussion and he would await further directions from England. Probably no direct response was received, perhaps none was ever requested. The assembly continued to adjourn itself till the practice was well established; but, when necessary, the governor also called and prorogued it, though amid frequent protests and complaints, all of which were the result of a failure to define properly the limits within which governor and assembly should act in this matter.

¹ Col. Recs, II, 56, 61.

² Votes of Ass. Ist, 11. For a comprehensive account of the practice in this regard under Governors Evans and Gookin see Votes, II, 421 et seq.

³ Proud, II, 48.

John Evans and Charles Gookin, the two men whom Penn appointed as governors after the death of Andrew Hamilton, and who stood nominally at the head of the province from 1703 until 1717, were both unfitted for the task that was imposed upon them. It was practically impossible that a Quaker should be appointed, and as Anglicans they were out of sympathy with the great body of the people whose affairs they had to administer. Both were unknown, inexperienced men of inferior personalities. The doings of both were petty and irritating to all parties concerned. Evans was more or less openly immoral.² The eldest son of the proprietor, while sharing in the escapades of the governor, and others, was arrested in a tavern brawl, and, in a fit of anger at the public exposure which followed this, renounced Quakerism and returned to England. Conduct of this character was as fatal to the success of officials among the sober citizens of Philadelphia as it would have been in Boston. Logan said that Gookin was the "poorest animal" he ever saw in the office of governor, though this shows that Logan was not acquainted with all the colonial governors. Gookin quarrelled with the assembly far less than did Evans, because he obstinately kept silence, but apparently before the end of his service he had forfeited the regard of virtually the whole province. There is no evidence that he ever exercised much influence. Both these men were selected by Penn on the recommendations of friends in England or Ireland. Could Logan have been appointed, he probably would have made a most successful governor, and some other equally faithful, but less able, person as agent could have collected the proprietor's rents, sold his lands and attended to his other private business.

¹ Pa. Col. Recs., II, 146-150, 157, 158; Votes I², 14. Penn-Logan Correspondence, I, 298, 299.

² See characterizations of him in Penn-Logan Correspondence, I, 318, 322; II, 144, 268.

Though the Quakers were still largely in the majority among the population of Pennsylvania and were to control its government for a long time to come, they were not a unit in its support, and controversies developed among them, as they did everywhere else in the colonies. There was a narrow rigidity about their individualism which made them quite as stubborn in the support of their opinions as were the Puritans, while in the arts of factional politics they had nothing to learn from any of the colonists. During the period of which we are speaking David Lloyd, as a member from Philadelphia county, was the leader of the opposition in the assembly. Of several of the assemblies he was speaker and their most influential member. He was accounted a good lawyer, was certainly a staunch Quaker and a partisan leader who was not slow to seize opportunities which might yield political advantage. He was much more representative of the average Quakers of Pennsylvania than was either Penn or Logan, both of whom had seen too much of the world to remain wholly in touch with the rank and file of their sect. Lloyd had been a strong opponent of Blackwell and later took the lead against a variety of encroachments by the executive and judiciary. He was suspended from the council because of an alleged insult to the court of admiralty and the royal commission which authorized it. The direct opposition of Lloyd to Penn began during the latter's recent visit to the province, when they were discussing the revision of the laws.¹ Lloyd had then drawn a so-called charter of property, of which, under pressure, Penn had conditionally approved, but later had revoked his assent. The purpose of Lloyd at that time was to make it possible to legislate with freedom concerning territorial as well as governmental relations. The feeling which was then aroused was intensified by difference of opinion about the acceptance of Andrew Hamilton as governor and questions connected with the separation from the Lower Counties. The points left unsettled by the Charter of Liberties were closely involved, and the attitude which the province should hold toward the war was also under discussion. In the assembly of 1704, action was proposed in these various lines and it was at that juncture that Lloyd appeared as the opponent of the proprietor and the political rival of Logan.

A bill confirming rights of property was passed by this assembly, drawn on lines similar to those of the so-called charter which Penn had rejected; also a bill modifying the charter of Philadelphia and granting additional privileges.² These were rejected by Evans, who always acted conjointly with the council. At the close of the session, and after replying finally to the governor, the house resolved to incorporate its grievances in an address to the proprietor. This was to deal plainly with him on the extent to which his commission to Evans was inconsistent with the privileges he had promised the people. The heads of this address were read to the house and approved, but the communication which was sent with them was prepared by Lloyd.³ This was the famous "Remonstrance" of 1704, of which Logan said that it was "a most virulent and unmannerly invective against the proprietor, dressings whatever had been mentioned in the minutes by the House in rude and most affrontive language and foisting other matters that he had no shadow of pretence for." This statement is borne out by the text, for it so dwelt on the alleged greed of the proprietor in his territorial and property relations as to lead to a protest against his proposed surrender of the province because it would look like "first fleecing and then selling." It was as much an attack on Logan as it was on Penn. The assembly never made itself responsible for it, and Penn considered it an insult so personal that he threatened to prosecute¹ Lloyd for it. Isaac Norris, when in England in 1707, took off a great deal of the edge of the "remonstrance" by assuring Penn and his friends that, though Lloyd had signed it as speaker and by order, it never regularly passed the assembly or was read there. Norris also circulated a signed certificate to that effect.²

¹ Col. Recs., II, 62, 325. Penn-Logan Correspondence, II, 371 et seq., 402 et seq., where the versions of this by Logan and Lloyd can be compared; Shepherd, 58.

² Penn-Logan Correspondence, I, 317; Col. Recs., II, 158; Votes Ist, 15 et seq.

³ It is printed in Sparks' ed. of the Writings of Franklin, III, 166 et seq. On the way in which it reached Penn, see Penn-Logan Correspondence, I, 327, 331; II, 64, 374, 407 et seq.

The assembly which was elected in the fall of 1704 did not differ essentially in sentiments from its predecessor.³ It chose Lloyd again as speaker. The former issues were revived by the assembly. It attempted again to revise the Charter of Privileges and to draw from the governor further replies to its messages of the last session. Both of these efforts failed, as did the attempt on the part of the governor and council to secure a copy of the "remonstrance." The assembly deplored the long delay in securing the royal approval of laws, and the proprietor complained of the great expense he incurred in paying the fees which were necessary to secure such approval.⁴ The grant of £2,000 made to him before his departure from the province had not been sufficient, and the assembly called for an itemized account of his expenditures in this service and would do what it could to meet the cost. Bickerings were exchanged between governor and assembly in several long addresses over the comparative merits and sacrifices of proprietors and people, quit rents and bill of

¹ Penn, through Evans, told the next assembly that he highly resented the heinous indignity and scandalous treatment of that letter, and if he thought it the act of the people it would be sufficient to cancel all obligations of his toward them. Votes I², 34-36; Col. Recs., II, 187.

² Penn-Logan Correspondence, II, 244, 248.

³ Votes I², 17 et seq.; Col. Recs., II, 164 et seq.

⁴ Votes I², 39-42; Col. Recs., II, 193-197.

property coming into the discussion, and all without result. Feelings were intensified by the remarks of an obscure member to the effect that ¹ the governor was a mere boy and should be kicked, and the prosecution of the offender raised a question of privilege. Finally the assembly was dismissed by the governor, he actually exercising the right of prorogation.

The house which was elected in the fall of 1705 was of a very different temper. Joseph Growden was chosen speaker, and perfect harmony existed between it and the governor throughout a long and very fruitful session. Conferences were freely held with the council and fifty-one acts were passed ² during its first session. This was closed by the governor passing the bills which had been prepared, though in the journal of the assembly there is no entry to show that it did otherwise than to adjourn itself.³ At the end of the next brief session the assembly also adjourned itself.⁴ Thereafter the house seems regularly to have adjourned on an understanding, express or tacit, with the governor.

The governor called the assembly together in September, 1706, in order to consider the passage of a number of laws to take the place of those which had recently been disallowed in England. Word had just been received that, of 105 laws submitted by the proprietor to the crown, 52 had been rejected.⁵ Of special importance was the passage of one act for the establishment of courts of justice and a law of property to take the place of those disallowed. The province and counties were now left without courts of justice, but, instead of prompt action to supply so serious a lack, a long controversy arose over details of the judicial system and that led into a struggle over the right to establish courts. David Lloyd, though not speaker at the beginning, was the

¹ Votes I², 46 et seq.; Col. Recs., II, 200 et seq.; Penn-Logan Correspondence, II, 33 et seq.

² Votes I², 49 et seq.; Col. Recs., II, 206 et seq.; Penn-Logan Correspondence, II, 80 et seq. The text of the acts passed is in Stats. at Large of Pa. 171-293.

³ Recs., of C. II, 230; Votes I², 81.

⁴ Votes, I², 85.

⁵ Col. Recs., II, 251-252; Stats. at Large of Pa. II, 449-456. The two acts here referred to are in ibid., 148, 191; and the reasons for their disallowance on pp. 471, 495 et seq.

active leader of the house in this controversy, as were Logan and Mompesson in the council.¹

In the judicial system, as hitherto established in Pennsylvania and the territories, the county courts had been thrown into great prominence and when, after delay, a provincial or supreme court was established, the intention clearly was to make it supplementary to the local courts rather than the chief judicial body in the province.² The act of 1701,³ which had just been disallowed and which applied to both province and territories, began with elaborate provisions concerning the county courts, giving them large jurisdiction, both criminal and civil, as courts of quarter sessions and common pleas. The county justices were also made judges in equity and as orphan courts these tribunals were given great powers over the appointment of guardians and the settlement and administration of estates. The judges of the provincial court, who were to go on circuit, were to try high crimes and hear cases on appeal, but only in a restricted way under writs of error. The idea underlying this was that justice should be brought as near as possible to every man's door, it should be made cheap and suitors from the counties should not be compelled unnecessarily to attend court in Philadelphia. Though the reasons assigned for the disallowance of this act, and later ones of the same nature, referred chiefly to loose expressions used, and some approval of the substance of the measures was expressed, it is not difficult to see that the principle of it, as just described, would bring it into such disagreement with the judicial system of England and of other colonies as to lead to serious objections. Evans also told the assembly that it had been found inconvenient and was complained of by all experienced men who practiced before the courts.⁴

In the history of the colonies there were not many instances like this of Pennsylvania, which by an act so simple as the disallowance of a law found itself deprived of a system of courts which had been in existence twenty years. In such

¹ Votes I², 88 et seq. Lloyd, however, was again chosen speaker in October, 1706.

² Shepherd, 371.

³ Stats. at Large, II, 148 et seq.

⁴ Votes I², p. 101.

a case as this the effect of the royal veto reached its maximum. As the result of it, a prolonged controversy followed in Pennsylvania, in which the judicial system proper to it was discussed in many long addresses and series of resolutions passed between the governor and assembly.¹ The occasion of this was the necessity of passing an act which should take the place of the one just disallowed. As incidents of the discussion some other points became involved. One was the old question of the right of the council to participate in legislation, which the assembly again denied, though throughout this entire controversy nothing is clearer than the fact that the council virtually legislated, although its action did not take the formal shape of the three readings of bills and their actual passage. The struggle was for the ideas which Logan and Mompesson supported as against those of Lloyd and his followers, and it is clear that it was the council far more than Evans that formulated the arguments. On one occasion a free conference was held between the assembly and the governor and council. The action of the council, however, was taken under the form of advice.²

Another point which made the action of the assembly offensive to the supporters of the proprietor was this, that the house attempted to incorporate in the measure a provision for appropriating judicial fines and forfeitures toward the payment of the salaries of the judges, instead of their going, as hitherto, to the proprietor.³ Another encroachment on Penn was seen in the claim that the justices should license taverns and ale houses, and that they should appoint the clerks of their courts. It was also insisted that judicial fees should be fixed either in this act or in another law which should specify the rates of all fees. They also sought to make judges removable on charges presented by the assembly. Other features of the plan which had a decidedly modern tendency were those which favored a method of trying cases involving titles to land which should be free from delays and legal fictions; also the feeling which was shown against undue imprisonment for debt, though it was charged with involving discrimination against creditors.

¹ Ibid., 93-115; Col. Recs., II, 253-279.

² Votes P^s, 108, 111, 121. The governor likened the function of the council to that of the attorney general in England.

³ In Philadelphia all fines went into the public chest. Col. Recs., II, 355.

But the radical fault which the council found in all the proposals that came from the assembly was the extent to which they were intended to push the county courts into the foreground, and that in spite of the almost total lack of trained lawyers in the province with whom to fill the many places on the bench. The main features of the act which had just been repealed reappeared in all their proposals. They seem to have conceived of the provincial court as having a sort of distinct existence in every county, with a clerk's office at Philadelphia where writs should be drawn to run throughout the province. This court should issue no original writs in civil cases, but only remedial, and of these the writ of error was the only one of which use was apparently intended to be made.¹ Original writs were to be returnable before justices of common pleas and quarter sessions. Under this system the counties would be to a large extent isolated from one another judicially, and it would be difficult for a litigant who faced prejudice at home to find another and an impartial tribunal.

As opposed to this plan of the Quaker, Lloyd, the council insisted that the governor and council should be the court of equity for the entire province, that the supreme court should have full common-law jurisdiction throughout the province, this being secured by the power to issue all original and remedial writs which were customarily issued by similar courts in other colonies and by the central courts in England, and by the judges going on circuit.² The county courts would then occupy the inferior position which they held elsewhere and the province would become judicially a unit. The courts of Philadelphia should have the same rank as other county courts. Suits should be begun in the provincial as well as in the county courts. Process would extend from county to county, or equally over the whole province. It contended that the common man would be adequately served under this system, while it insisted that the rights of creditors should be duly guarantied, as well as those of the proprietor, including that of establishing courts by executive action.

¹ Votes I², pp. 95, 102.

² Col. Recs., II, 257 et seq. It was claimed by Lloyd that part of the ancient Ordinance of Wales was revoked by act of William and Mary because it gave the president and council the power of a court of chancery; the equity power was vested in the counties. This, he said, was the precedent for his bill. Votes I², 114, 121, 123.

The controversy was prolonged, with most tiresome repetition and detail. In its later stages the question of the tenure of judges and the obligation of the governor to remove them on an address from the assembly came more into prominence.¹ The governor declared that he would not part with the power to remove purely on his own discretion, though he should always give great weight to an address from the assembly, especially if accompanied with proofs. While a conference was being held, a dispute arose between Evans and Lloyd over the failure of the latter, as speaker, to stand when he addressed the governor.²

Finally, on February 28, 1706/7, Evans issued the ordinance which he had so long threatened, for the establishment of courts.³ In this he followed some of the main features of the assembly's bill,⁴ though the ordinance provided for a better compacted system, referred carefully at all points to English precedents, and was much more clearly drawn than was Lloyd's measure. The assembly presented a long remonstrance against this act,⁵ in which they claimed that the ordinance power granted by the royal charter did not extend to this, and that in law the courts could not be revived without the cooperation of the assembly.

But some time before this the personal feelings of Lloyd and his supporters toward Logan had become so strong as to result in an attempt to impeach him before the governor.⁶ The charges which they preferred were based on the claim that Logan was attempting to introduce arbitrary government into the province.⁷ His interpretation of it was that the real object of their attack was the proprietor and his system of government, but this was probably no more true than the

¹ Col. Recs., II, 302, 311.

² Ibid., 314 et seq.

³ Stats. at Large, II, 500; Col. Recs., II, 337; Votes I², 152.

⁴ Compare the ordinance with Votes I², 95 et seq. The provision for the establishment of the provincial court was taken from Lloyd's bill, but equity jurisdiction was given to the justices of the provincial court.

⁵ Votes I², 157-159; Col. Recs., II, 349-353.

⁶ Votes I², 113.

⁷ Col. Recs., II, 344, et seq. 353.

oft-repeated charge of royal officials that the colonists were aiming at independence. The charges, so far as they were specific, had reference to the alleged foisting upon the province of the proprietor's veto and of the governor's right to prorogue and dissolve the assembly, to the fact that Logan held both offices of secretary and surveyor general, and to certain acts of his in the administration of the property rights of the proprietor and in reference to the election of a sheriff in Philadelphia. Of some of these charges Logan disclaimed all knowledge and in regard to the others he showed that he had simply followed the ordinary routine of business. But the case never came to a trial, for the reason that the governor had no authority to sit as judge in an impeachment case, while the assembly refused to acknowledge that the council had any judicial powers.¹ There was no "middle state" in the constitution of an American province, corresponding to the house of lords, which could hear and determine impeachments. Hence the process failed, though Logan plead for a full hearing and exoneration, since the publication by the house of its charges had injured his reputation and business.

Justice continued to be administered under the ordinance until after the close of Evans' administration, early in 1709. But the dissatisfaction also continued, and Gookin, Evans' successor, found included among the grievances laid before him the complaint that the courts of the province did not as yet rest on a sure statutory basis.² Penn had ordered that all ordinances and commissions should continue in force till his further pleasure was known, and it was under the authority of this that the courts were held until 1711; then, as the result of further discussion, a detailed judiciary act was passed.³ In substance this was based upon the ordinance of 1706, but it contained many elaborate provisions concerning appeals, the issue of writs and action thereunder and in regulation of suits for the recovery of debts. Three years later — early in 1714 — this act,⁴ along with several other

¹ Col. Recs., II, 365 et seq.

² Votes, II, 30.

³ Col. Recs., II, 519, 522-529. Stats. at Large, II, 301 et seq. Shepherd, 382.

⁴ Stats. at Large, II, 545-549.

Pennsylvania laws, was disallowed, the reasons being that some of its provisions tended unduly to multiply suits, and that among certain English statutes which were adopted by the act it was stated that one of them should be put in execution, "so far as circumstances admitted," which the attorney general regarded as an improper statement.

Because of these faults, which might have been removed by referring the measure back to the assembly for amendment, Pennsylvania was again plunged into judicial chaos. In July, 1714, Gookin reestablished the courts by ordinance,¹ its provisions being similar to those in the ordinance which Evans had issued. This raised again the old question of legality, though without the former violent controversy. In May, 1715, five separate acts were passed — one establishing courts of quarter sessions, another the courts of common pleas, a third the provincial court, a fourth providing for better ascertaining the practice of courts of judicature and a fifth regulating appeals to Great Britain.² Provision was now made for a supreme court which should sit in Philadelphia and have original jurisdiction, its powers being as ample as the common law courts at Westminster. In 1719 all of these laws, except the one relating to appeals to Great Britain, were disallowed.³ The representation of the board of trade against these acts shows that the objections again were so frivolous as almost to raise the suspicion that they were trying so to perplex this proprietary province in its judicial business as to force a surrender of its charter. Against a provincial court organized according to the best model they revived Raymond's objection to it as defined on a different basis in an earlier act, while the board condemned the laws concerning the other courts because they contained the expression "as near as conveniently may be," when referring to the observance of certain details of English judicial procedure, an expression which had been used so often in all sorts of documents which the British government itself had issued in reference to the colonies as to make it a commonplace.

¹ Ibid., 556.

² Stats. at Large, III, 32, 33, 65-83; Col. Recs. II, 578-585, 595; Shepherd, 384. Though Lloyd was still speaker, the journals show no evidence of disagreement between the assembly and council.

³ Stats. at Large, III, 464-468.

The various riders which the assembly for a long time tried to pass with the court bills of course failed in that form. Fines and forfeitures continued to go to the proprietor, as did the revenue from tavern licenses, though by an act of 1711 the county justices had received the right to recommend those who were to be licensed. The governor had shown no opposition to the regulation of fees, and in 1711 and again in 1715 comprehensive acts providing for those were passed. But both of these acts were disallowed in England on the ground that it was the intention to reject the court act and that would remove the reason for specifying the fees of justices who would not be appointed.¹

With the failure of the first bill for the establishment of courts and also of the proceedings against Logan the anger of the assembly had broken forth against Evans. There was nothing which could longer shield him from the expression of profound dissatisfaction with which he had long been viewed. In order fully to understand the depth of this feeling, it will be necessary to refer to the attitude of Pennsylvania toward the war and the doings of Evans in that connection. In 1704 the first requisition of the crown since the beginning of the second colonial war reached Pennsylvania. It was that £350 st. should be contributed toward the defence of New York.² The assembly declined to accede to this proposal, giving as an excuse that they had the back settlements of Indians to secure and protect. In any case, and especially as circumstances then were in Pennsylvania, this was clearly an evasion of the issue. It was intended to divert attention from the real objection to the demand, which was the refusal of the Quakers to be at all concerned with war. Governor Evans was not content with the reply and pressed the subject again, using the argument that their refusal of the aid would probably hinder action by the queen in confirmation of their laws and prejudice the interests of the province in other ways.³ The assembly was also told that the proprietor expected they would refund to him the salary of the late Governor Hamilton, and it was suggested that a salary should be provided for the present incumbent. Judge Mompesson, Edward Shippen and James Logan carried this message to the house, but reported that "there was some appearance of dissatisfaction upon it."

¹ Stats. at Large, II, 96, 331, 357, 440, 466, 543.

² Col. Recs., II, 133, 136, 139; Penn-Logan Corr. I, 329 et seq.

³ Col. Recs., II, 142-3. Shepherd, op. cit. 297 et seq.

Evans, however, soon issued a proclamation commanding all persons, whose persuasion in religion would permit them so to do, to provide themselves with arms and enlist in the militia which he now began to organize.¹ Naturally, activity in this line was greatest in the lower counties, though enlistments were encouraged in Philadelphia by exemption from certain civic duties. This experiment, though greatly needed at the time, was frowned upon by the Quakers. No appropriation, of course, could be obtained toward the payment of its cost. Both the resources and the personal character of the governor were too narrow to enable him to meet the situation liberally. As a result, a few companies of volunteers were formed and continued in existence for about two years and then disbanded. During that time, however, the disgust of the Quakers with the governor was raised to the point of culmination,² on account of the false alarm which was spread by him and others, in May, 1706, on the pretence that a French naval force was advancing up the bay. This half-insane freak was followed by the passage of a law in the lower counties for the erection of a fort at Newcastle, where a tonnage duty in powder should be collected from every vessel that went up and down the river.³ This touched the sensibilities of the Pennsylvanians anew, for it interfered with their freedom of trade along the river and bay. But they soon managed to abate the evil by seizing and disciplining the commander of the fort and making a strong protest to the assembly at Newcastle which had caused it to be built. Thus ended in failure and in mutual irritation the efforts of Evans to provide in some measure for the defence of Pennsylvania.

In the summer of 1707 the assembly preferred a long list of the alleged private and public misdeeds of the governor to be sent to their agents for presentation to the proprietor.

¹ Proud, I, 459. Penn-Logan Corr. II, 159.

² Proud, I, 468 et seq.

³ Ibid., 471, et seq.

To these they added certain charges against Logan. Then, ignoring the command of Evans that they should make known all their addresses to him, they adjourned themselves till fall. But from Logan, through Norris after the latter's arrival in England,¹ and in other ways, Penn had received information of the unfitness of Evans for his post. Norris told him that he thought as good a head was required for the government of Pennsylvania as for that of most of the other plantations. It was already evident that Penn intended to remove Evans, but whether William, the heir-at-law, would be appointed his successor Norris could not make out. As Penn was then a prisoner in the Fleet, to outward appearances the fortunes of the proprietorship could not have been lower.

Finally, in March, 1708,² Penn wrote that the three agents of the assembly had visited him and stated how lamentable was the condition of the province under Evans, and had said that, if he were not discharged and an acceptable person put in his place, they would bring the complaint of the assembly before the queen and council. Penn, deploring especially the moral obliquities of Evans, had thus been forced to turn aside from his more personal troubles to find a successor. Charles Gookin was the man whom he found, a man of whose family Penn had had "some knowledge" for forty years, who was highly recommended by Generals Earle and Cadogan, and by others, including some friends in Ireland. Sobriety, good morals and a general spirit of fidelity seemed the chief qualifications of Gookin, as valuable perhaps as those which most of the military men possessed who were sent over by the British government. At the same time also Penn reached a settlement with the Fords and immediately mortgaged the land of the province to Henry Gouldney, Joshua Gee and other friends in England who had aided him in his difficulties. Logan and others were ordered to care for Penn's property, sell lands and collect what was due him in the province. This put a somewhat brighter face on his affairs, but they were in the midst of war, and dangers from various quarters still threatened the continuance of proprietary government in Pennsylvania.¹

¹ Penn-Logan Corr. II, 238.

² Ibid., 267 et seq. These were Whitehead, Meade and Lower, who were informally selected to act for the assembly because they were known not to be on friendly terms with Penn.

During the first two years of Gookin's administration (1708-1710) he was beset by the troubles which were inherited from his predecessor. Lloyd still remained speaker of the assembly and it continued, as heretofore, to voice his animosities. The fact that when they first² met the new governor was absent at Newcastle did not improve their temper, but it gave them an opportunity of again asserting the right of adjourning themselves, a practice which, under minor restrictions, was now becoming pretty well established. When the assembly met first for business, in March, 1709, in its address the complaints against Evans were again rehearsed and marshaled as grievances. In his reply Gookin, after giving the members good advice about laying aside the jealousies of the past and applying themselves to the business of the present and future, expressed his approval of the attitude which Evans had taken on the establishment of courts, and deprecated the calling of the advice "evil" which was given by the council.³ He urged the passage of various measures, among them one for the support of government and for the security of its people. This was immediately followed by a sweeping assertion from the assembly that Logan and others of the council were chiefly responsible for the miseries and confusion of the province. The assembly was also at issue with the provincial treasurer on the ground that he, instead of paying the public debts on orders signed by the speaker, had leaned for advice on the council, of which he — Samuel Carpenter — was a member.⁴ With the delivery of a long remonstrance to the governor,⁵ filled with minor complaints and insinuating that Gookin had shown lack of zeal in public service, the house adjourned for a short recess.

When the session was resumed the requisition had come from the queen for a quota of men in aid of the expedition under Colonel Vetch which was planning for the conquest

¹ Proud, I, 485. Penn-Logan Corr, II, 306, 352. Shepherd, 198. Keith, Chronicles of Pa., 488 et seq.

² Votes, II, 17 et seq.

³ Ibid., 19, 20.

⁴ See Stats. at Large, II, 290; Votes, II, 5 et seq., 24, 29.

⁵ Ibid., 32.

of Canada.¹ To the fate of that demand reference has elsewhere been made. Here it should be stated that it was kept alive for months. The governor repeated the demand, the assembly offered a gift of £500, which was so small that Gookin drew a contrast between the heavy taxation to which England was then submitting and a sum which was so much less than the reasonable proportion of Pennsylvania.² The actual appropriating of the £500 went over till the next session, after harvest. The house, however, caught up a hasty remark of the governor about some of its members being turbulent and this made the discussion more personal. About midsummer Lewes, at the mouth of the bay, was plundered by French privateers, while it was felt that some attention should be paid to the Conestoga Indians. These events, combined with growing unrest in the lower counties, owing to their exposure without means of defence, various defects in their government, and the efforts of Lord Baltimore to get possession of them, led to serious reflections upon the possibility of Penn being able to retain his proprietorship. To the mind of Logan and others the ability of Quakers long to manage the government of a province which was exposed to the perils of war was clearly open to question. Robert Quarry was now in the later days of his activity and continued to be an object of Penn's keen distrust. But Logan thought him useful as a critic of the attitude of the assembly, and that he was not unfriendly to the governor, council and those who were supporting Penn and trying to carry on the government in conformity with British ideas.³

In its session of the late summer of 1709 the assembly began to dicker with the governor over a slightly increased appropriation and a redress of grievances. Among the grievances the lack of a statute for the establishment of courts held a prominent place, and the discussion led to the passage of Gookin's act, to which reference has already been made. It was while the court bill and its accompanying act for the regulation of fees were under debate that the controversy over Logan again blazed up.⁴ Robert Ashton, a leading

¹ Ibid., 34 et seq.

² Ibid., 38-40, 42; Penn-Logan Corr., II, 343, 346, 349-353.

³ Ibid., 358.

⁴ Votes, II, 53 et seq.

lawyer of Philadelphia, and the attorney general were at first joint objects of attack with the secretary. Several months before, Logan had complained to the governor that he had not been permitted to clear himself from the former charges. Now, on the last day of the session and just before the fall election of 1709 the assembly, under the name of a remonstrance,¹ launched another savage attack at Logan, charging him with responsibility for all the alleged evils of the province, and with favoring arbitrary government. It was said that he controlled the council and that without its consent the governor could not act. This was used to influence the election in favor of Lloyd, and the old members of the house were returned. Lloyd was again elected speaker and the former hostile attitude was resumed. Logan now in a communication to the governor attacked Lloyd with equal vehemence and demanded an opportunity to clear himself² from the charges. He also petitioned the house on the subject, demanding a trial. It resolved that he should at once answer all the charges which had been brought against him at his impeachment. But meantime charges which Logan had made against the speaker came before the house, and the quarrel becoming greatly embittered, it ordered the sheriff of Philadelphia to arrest and imprison Logan. The governor interposed and forbade him to proceed, his reason being that Logan was not a member of the assembly and so was not under its jurisdiction, and also that, as he was about to sail for England, the object of this move was to prevent his going thither on business important to the province and the proprietor. Gookin also claimed, since the assembly had come together after an adjournment for several days earlier in the session without his calling it, that it was no longer a house which he was bound to recognize. Though it was now only the beginning of December, 1709, no further business was done. Several favorite bills of the assembly failed and it soon adjourned never to meet again. Before the next election the futility of Lloyd's opposition seems to have been made clear to the electors and a new set of assemblymen was chosen, in October 1710.¹ Richard Hill was elected speaker and between this assembly and the governor and council thorough harmony prevailed.²

¹ Penn-Logan Corr., II, 360 et seq.; Votes II, 65.

² Ibid., 70 et seq.; Col. Recs., II, 507; Proud II, 39 et seq.

In marked contrast to recent assemblies, this body devoted itself strictly to the business of legislation and not to the drafting of controversial addresses. Its first session passed without incident and at its close fourteen laws were accepted³ by the governor, the product of its activity. These included comprehensive acts for the establishment of courts and regulation of fees, for the support of the government, for the licensing of inns and against riotous sports and games.

Before the house met for its second session the summons had come from the queen for a contribution toward the land expedition of 1711 against Canada.⁴ The assembly voted £2000 for the queen's use, by a combination of the general property tax and poll tax. The question arose as to whether the amount so raised should be paid directly to the governor or to the treasurer and be issued by him on the governor's order. On the advice of the council Gookin insisted upon the former method. This led to delay till a later session, but did not change the resolve of the assembly,⁵ and the treasurer was made the immediate custodian of the grant; the amount, however, to be used for the expedition was to be paid by him to the governor and to be transferred by him in turn to the officers empowered by royal authority to receive and expend it. The expedition, as we know, was abandoned in its early stages, and as late as 1713 Governor Gookin was complaining to the assembly that this appropriation had not been collected. Persons whose servants had gone on the expedition had not yet been paid.⁶

The manifold difficulties with which Penn and his province were beset had led him as early as 1703 to think of surrendering his rights of government, or of both land and government,

¹ Lloyd's vindication of himself against Logan's attacks is in Penn-Logan Corr., II, 402 et seq.

² Votes, II, 73.

³ Col. Recs., II, 529; Stats. at Large, II, 301-399.

⁴ Votes, II, 97 et seq., 101; Col. Recs., II, 534, 535 et seq. Payments were to be made in money, wheat or flour.

⁵ Stats. at Large, II, 396.

⁶ Votes, II, 138. The question of compensation for the loss of servants who ran away to New Jersey and enlisted also came up at this time.

to the crown. The attacks made upon him by Randolph, Quarry and others, the manifest purpose of the board of trade to overthrow all chartered colonies, the surrender of New Jersey, the fact that so much of his fortune had been spent in the experiment, all conspired to bring him to this resolution.¹ In June, 1703, he submitted a number of proposals on the subject, among which was the confirmation by the crown of the laws and constitutions of the province and the concession to Penn and his heirs of the privilege of nominating two or more persons for governor, one of whom must be appointed. The object of these conditions was the safeguarding of the interests of the Quakers. The land, of both the province and the lower counties, he desired to reserve, under conditions not unlike those which the Calverts enjoyed in Maryland. The offer was not acceptable to the crown and negotiations were suspended until 1705. Then, because of increased pressure by the Anglicans and of the extent to which he had become involved with the Fords, Penn submitted new proposals in which his demand to nominate the governors did not appear. These were rejected and to a query from Penn the board of trade replied that what it demanded was an unconditional surrender of powers of government, with the reservation to Penn and his heirs of rights to the soil and privileges incident thereto. In spite of this, however, Penn again asked that the laws which guarantied to the inhabitants a representative assembly elected annually, with power to make laws, levy taxes and sit on its own adjournments, and that the law granting liberty of conscience should never be abridged, nor the Quakers subjected to any fines or forfeitures by reason of their dress or carriage or be compelled to serve in the militia or contribute to warlike charges. He also asked that the soil of the province and territories be guarantied to him, that he and his family be exempt from provincial taxes and that the county of Bucks be erected into a palatinate. For various reasons, one of which was that the territories could not be considered in the negotiation as they formed no part of the province under the charter, these terms were also rejected. Logan was now advising Penn to make the surrender, and he strongly urged the board to promote an agreement. But it was now hoped that the result would soon be reached by act of parliament and the negotiations with Penn were dropped.

¹ B. T. Properties, C. O. 5/1290, June, 1703; Root, Pennsylvania and the British Government, 354 et seq.

Early in 1707, however, the board was induced to report to the secretary of state in favor of arranging for an unconditional surrender of the government of both the province and territories, but that a money compensation should be given to Penn. This was intended to be some return for the debt which the crown had originally owed his father and for the large unproductive outlay of the proprietor himself upon a province the trade of which was already large and a growing source of revenue. Inquiries were made as to the cost of administering the government and Penn proposed £20,000 as a satisfactory compensation, but again the matter was dropped. In 1708/9, after Penn had become bankrupt and mortgaged his province, the lower counties began to question his right of government, to complain that no provision was made for their defence and to threaten to appeal to the crown.¹ This feeling was further encouraged by the attitude of the Quakers toward the Canada expeditions and the descent of French privateers on the coast. Proposals of surrender were renewed in 1710, but again no progress was made beyond the point previously reached. Early in 1712 Penn's proposals were passed on by Attorney General Northey and a deed of surrender was drawn up, Penn having established his title to the Delaware region. It was agreed that he should receive £12,000, and £1,000 was actually paid on account before the deed was executed. Before the next step was taken Penn was incapacitated by two strokes of apoplexy, and though two years later the crown tried to perfect the deed by act of parliament, owing to differences between the mortgagees and the Penn heirs this too failed, and Pennsylvania continued a proprietary province. Mrs. Hannah Penn, in conjunction with the mortgagees, and with the advice of Logan, continued to attend, as she was able, to the affairs of the proprietor till his death in 1718,¹ but all the time wishing that the connection of her family with Pennsylvania had been severed before her husband was incapacitated. To this level did the proprietary side of government in Pennsylvania sink during those years.

¹ Penn-Logan Corr., II, 303, 311, 324-326, 334, 337, 347. Logan wrote to Penn, Oct. 15, 1713, "I am told that at y^e last elections in y^e Lower Counties, y^e generality of y^e people combined not to choose one Quaker, that they might be the better able to inquire what right Penn has to call upon them for Quit-rents." Logan Letter Bk. (Ms.) 1712-1715, fol. 155.

In the province itself the conduct of Gookin at this time was such as to reduce his influence for any good purposes to zero. In 1713, at a time when, owing to the illness of Penn, the future of the province was uncertain, the break between Gookin and both the council and assembly began. The communications addressed by Gookin to the assembly were always very brief and contained but little, except what he was ordered from England to submit. He apparently left the assembly largely to take its own course—at periods he was decidedly uncommunicative. The salary which was appropriated to him—about £300 a year²—was small and was not regularly paid.³ The dispute which first arose was over the appointment, just before Penn's illness, of a register general and the transfer to the new incumbent of the records of the office.⁴ In June, 1712, Peter Evans was appointed by the proprietor and about three weeks later Benjamin Mayne was appointed by the governor. Evans filed the proper bond for the office but Mayne did not, and the latter, having custody of the records, refused to deliver them, the governor stubbornly supporting him in this. The assembly finally took up the case and at last forced the surrender of the papers and the proper installation of Evans into office. Various complaints were also made from Philadelphia, and during this session the assembly was occupied for some time with grievances. At a later session of the same assembly the governor refused to recognize it because two-thirds of its members were not present on the opening day of the session.⁵ The house admitted that an attendance of two-thirds was necessary

¹ Penn MSS. Three Lower Cos., 11 et seq.; Penn and Baltimore, 1653-1754.

² Logan L. B. 1712-1715, fol. 301 et seq. (Logan to Hannah Penn, Aug. 17, 1715); Col. Recs., II, 611, 612.

³ Votes, II, 123, 130, 138.

⁴ Votes, II, 140-142, 144-146, 147; L. L. B. (MS.) 1712-1715, fol. 118 et seq. Gookin may have been moved by some doubt as to the competency of Penn when he supposed Evan's appointment was made. See letter of Hannah Penn, Feb. 16, 1713-14; Penn MSS. P. F. to L., fol. 62.

⁵ Votes, II, 148-149.

for legislation, but a less number could meet and adjourn, and this was all they attempted to do on the occasion referred to. But when a committee was sent to state this view to the governor, he refused to receive their message and bade them be gone about their business or he would order the sheriff and constables to send them going.

Gookin soon broke also with the council, and in October, 1714, Logan wrote, "we have also at present such a Governor and affairs are so oddly managed amongst us that y^e like has seldom, I believe, been seen. Matters of y^e highest importance are transacted without any advice of council; but all factions against y^e proprietor being over, we are generally pretty easie."¹ Soon after, Gookin is said to have been acting as if he was absolute in the Lower Counties, appointing rangers without advice of council.² It was in counties that affairs came to the worst pass before his administration ended. As a result of a personal quarrel he turned all the magistrates of Newcastle county out of office and left the people for several weeks without a court of justice.³ Because of the fact that the connection with the Lower Counties might be completely severed, such conduct as this was viewed with special alarm. The members of the council claimed that they had made all reasonable efforts to conciliate the governor but without success.

Finally Gookin broke completely with both the council and assembly over the question of the oath. Of the bearings of that question on relations with the British government and the repeal of the acts of 1700 and 1706 providing for the affirmation an account has already been given. In 1711 still another act providing for the affirmation without the use of the word God was passed in Pennsylvania and disallowed in England,⁴ the impulse thereto being given by a petition from Rev. John Talbot and the leading members of his vestry and church wardens at Burlington, New Jersey. In 1714 an act of parliament⁵ was passed making the act 7 and 8

¹ Logan to Mrs. Penn, L. L. B. 1712-15, fol. 184.

² Ibid., 202. Corr. of James Logan, I, fol. 75; Wm. Penn, Jr. to Gookin, Sept. 17, 1714.

³ Letter of Council to Penn, Aug, 11, 1715, in Pa. Reg. II, 69; P. F. to L. II, 83 et seq.; Council to Hannah Penn, Oct. 8, 1715.

⁴ Pa. Stats. at Large, II, 355, 536 et seq.

⁵ 1 Geo. I, C. 6.

William III relating to the affirmation by Quakers perpetual in the realm and extending it for five years in the plantations. As the affirmation provided for in the act of William contained the name of God and also provided that no Quaker should give evidence in criminal cases or serve on juries or hold any place of profit, Gookin began to claim that these conditions were now in force in the province and would invalidate the commissions and acts of all judges and other officers who could not administer or take an oath.¹ The issue was thus raised in October, 1716; while more than a year before that Gookin had assented to an act making substantially the same provision for the affirmation as had been included in the laws already disallowed.² This last act had not yet been repealed and it was held by the assembly to be the law of the province.³ In this view the council concurred. The view of the governor was that it would be such, had it not been for the extension of the act of William to the plantations. The legality of the entire official system of Pennsylvania and of its administration of justice was thus challenged, and in the opinion of his opponents it was the desire of Gookin to get even with them that led him to take this course. To make the crisis more acute Gookin also charged Richard Hill and James Logan — the former being both speaker of the house and mayor of Philadelphia — with being Jacobites and disaffected toward the government of Great Britain.⁴ This was a charge often brought against Quakers by those who wished maliciously to cause them trouble in England, because they refused the oath. When his reasons for this charge were demanded Gookin denied that he was obliged to give reasons to the house and said that he would state them to the board of trade at home. The assembly was deeply stirred by the charge, of the truth of which it declared that no evidence whatever could be found. Not content with this it appointed a committee, among whose members were Isaac Norris and David Lloyd, to prepare an elaborate representation to the governor on the state of affairs in the province and

¹ Votes II, 194 et seq.

² Stats. at Large, III, 59.

³ It was not disallowed until 1719.

⁴ Votes II, 196-200

adjourned for several days until this was ready. Then it was fully discussed and approved.¹ In this they fell back upon the royal charter to Penn, contending that its plain intent was to make possible a Quaker colony, which of course implied that such practices as the affirmation should be provided for by its laws and recognized as valid. The prohibition based on repugnancy must be so interpreted as to permit this or the enterprise would have been made impossible from the first. Quoting Governor Hunter and Chief Justice Jameson, who were fighting the same battle for the Quakers in New Jersey,² they declared that the act of William did not bar any laws favorable to them which were made in the colonies, but rather, when extended thither, made such privileges as they enjoyed in England also the permanent possession of the colonists. In the light of the controlling facts of the situation, this interpretation favorable to freedom was the only possible one. To it Gookin, who a few months later was superseded, never made an answer. Finally, after the hopelessness of the situation had repeatedly been made clear to them, the members of the Penn family, amid their perplexities, and with the advice of the mortgagees and other friends, selected Sir Col. William Keith as Gookin's successor.³

¹ Ibid., 200-207. Also printed in Proud, II, 74 et seq.

² Tanner, Province of New Jersey, 490 et seq. (C. U. Studies).

³ For the correspondence leading to this, see Penn Family to J. Logan and Letter Book (MS.). Gookin repeated to Governor Keith his wild charge that Logan was disaffected toward the government, but when called before the council he abjectly failed to substantiate his statements. Col. Recs., III, 15 et seq.

PART TWO

THE COLONIES DURING THE INTERVAL OF PEACE BETWEEN THE SECOND AND THIRD INTERCOLONIAL WARS
1714-1740

CHAPTER I

THE ATTITUDE OF THE CABINET, PARLIAMENT AND THE BOARD OF TRADE TOWARD QUESTIONS OF COMMERCE AND COLONIZATION UNDER THE EARLY HANOVERIANS

IN July, 1715, news reached England of the imminent peril which the inhabitants of South Carolina were facing in the war with the Yemassee Indians.¹ Governor Craven wrote directly to the secretary of state upon the subject and appealed for aid to preserve the valuable frontier province. Spotswood also wrote from Virginia on the same subject. The board of trade was at once ordered to inquire into the situation and report what should be done. The proprietors were summoned to attend, but even before that they had written the board offering to repay the government for the men, arms and ammunition which they could not provide but which they felt were necessary for the preservation of the province. Not long before this Abel Kettleby, of the Inner Temple and already a landgrave, had been designated by statute as agent of the province to look after its interests in the matter of the bounty on naval stores and other subjects. He now appeared at the board of trade along with Johnson and Shelton and an offer was made to mortgage their charter for military assistance. Several other meetings of the board were held to discuss this subject, at one of which both secretaries of state were present, and later the board was called before the cabinet. The result of this was that a series of questions was put to the proprietors, replies to which brought out their estimate of the help they needed in order to save the province.² The last query related to the surrender of the province, and to this the proprietors replied that they were willing to do this only for an equitable consideration. Their ancestors had expended large sums in settling and improving the colony and the revenue from rice and skins made it valuable to the crown. In the past its defence had cost them much. The fact that several of the proprietors were minors and could not act prevented them from making surrender at that time.

¹ B. T. Journal, July 8, 1715, and later entries; N. C. Col. Recs., II, 177, 187 et seq.; McCrady, South Carolina under Proprietary Govt., 537 et seq.; Kellogg, The Colonial Charter, 308.

² N. C. Recs., II, 193.

The agents of the province had been instructed, in case the proprietors did not offer relief, to apply to king and parliament. The board of trade also suggested to the secretary of state that by legislative action the colony be taken directly under protection. The house of commons referred the subject to a committee, papers were sent for and on August 10 leave was given to introduce a bill for the better regulation of charter and proprietary governments.¹ Popple, the secretary of the board, was busy in presenting the bill and it was advanced as far as the second reading. Protests or appeals against it were presented on behalf of the various proprietors and the agents of Connecticut and Rhode Island also appeared. Lord Carteret, who was now palatine of Carolina and was rising to large influence as a statesman in England, exerted himself to such effect in support of himself and the other petitioners that the bill was smothered in committee.² With this came to a close efforts in parliament to recall the charters by legislative act.

But the board of trade continued its attacks upon them, as did royal officials in America, and anxiety on the part of some of the chartered colonies led them to continue precautions for defence of their rights through agents or in other ways.³ One of the agents who had been concerned in the defence of this cause against the bill of 1715 was Jeremiah Dummer, who represented both Massachusetts and Connecticut in England. The success of the favorite policy of the board of trade in South Carolina, followed in 1721 by a strong repetition of its views in its elaborate report to the crown, caused anxiety, and Massachusetts, through Dummer, presented an address to the king for the continuance of their chartered privileges. This was followed by the publication in England of Dummer's "Defence of the New England Charters," prefaced by a dedication to Lord Carteret.

¹ C. O. 5/1265, B. T. Properties; J. of H. of Commons, XVIII, August 2, 1715, and succeeding entries, pp. 250, 262, 268, 270, 273, 274. The committee which had the bill in charge included Molesworth, Chetwynd and Dominique of the board of trade, Steele, Bladen, Pitt and all the merchants of the house.

² Dummer's statement was that the house thought fit, "upon hearing the Petitions presented to them on that Occasion to drop their Proceedings . . ." Dummer's "Defence of the Charters." This bill was presented to the house by John Chetwynd, a member of the board of trade.

³ Kellogg, 311.

In this able pamphlet we have a reply, as nearly conclusive as it was possible to make it, to the partisan attacks, in support of which many exaggerated and random statements had been made and repeated on every possible occasion, from the early days of Randolph through the period of Quarry's activity to the time of its publication. New England was the classic land of the chartered colony. Dummer was a New England man and he knew its people, their spirit and history as neither Randolph nor any royal official imported from Great Britain could possibly know it. Among the earlier defenders of proprietary rights, since the fall of the first Massachusetts charter, William Penn had held the leading place. But he had passed away, and now a New England writer took up the theme again and so condensed the views both of the past and the present on this subject as to satisfy the feeling, at least of his section, and to furnish them with a justification upon which they could safely fall back in the future.

He voiced the conviction at the outset that, owing to blunders of the agents or in some other unexplained way, Massachusetts failed to secure the restoration of her liberties when her second charter was issued. He contended that by the reservations of that document the dependence of Massachusetts on the crown was effectually secured. As to the charters themselves, in contrast to those granted to corporations in England in return for past services, Dummer claimed that the colonial charters were given as premiums for services to be performed, "Grants upon a valuable Consideration," and therefore carried greater weight and stronger title. The old New England contention that they were of a higher nature than corporations in the realm he also reaffirmed. He then went on to enlarge upon the great cost in money, courage, endurance and suffering which had attended the founding of those colonies. To this he added an account of the profits and other advantages which came to Great Britain from the colonies—the large value of her products which they took and their exports which were sent to her. In that connection a specially strong point was made by Dummer when he showed that, were it not for the supplies of lumber, provisions and horses which were furnished by the northern colonies, the island colonies would not be able to carry on their production of sugar and other staples. The contribution which New England was making—and much more might have been done—to the growth of the British navy and mercantile marine also came in for due attention. To strip New England of its charters after such services had been rendered and while they were still being rendered in increasing measure seemed to Dummer to be “abhorrent from all Reason, Equity and Justice.”

Dummer then passed to the reasons which were urged in support of the attacks upon the charters and to one of the palliations that was suggested as an excuse for it. The latter was to the effect that though the charters were taken away the crown would not take away the soil. In answer to this he declared, like Roger Williams, that the Indian title to the soil was the only fair and just one, and that the most which the crown could grant was the right of preemption, that is the right to occupy and to extinguish Indian titles as against the intrusion of other nations. And, he continued, the soil over which it gave this right at the beginning was worth nothing and was almost inaccessible and such value as it now possessed had been given it by the settlers. This, of course, was true and in the light of it the claims of royal officials in London and the colonies shrink to much smaller dimensions than they appeared to have when first uttered.

But the British, even if they acknowledged the justice of Dummer's argument thus far, would say that the colonies were defended by their fleet and if it was not for it they would be lost and with this all the advantages which the colonists had won would be sacrificed. This suggests the subject of defence and the complaints on that score which had occupied so prominent a place in the indictment of New England and of the chartered colonies generally. In answer to this Dummer reviewed the record thus far of New England, and especially of Massachusetts, in wars with the Indians and the French, in aid to Jamaica in 1703 and Nevis in 1705 and in efforts to extend British territory on the northeast and to conquer Canada itself. In this argument, which was never forgotten, he met the complaint which in this connection was directed against New England as a whole and showed the contrast between its activity and the neutrality under which New York had existed so long.

In another section Dummer returned to the argument which Winthrop had used nearly eighty years before by explaining the system of elections, the jury system and other guaranties of civil rights which existed in New England, though like his predecessor he avoided reference to the position of those who dissented from the established religion in Massachusetts and Connecticut. This was the answer of both Winthrop and Dummer to the charge that the government of their colonies was arbitrary. Dummer could cite the Andros régime — which Winthrop could not — as an example of what a government was which was really autocratic in its relations to the entire people. In answering the charge respecting illegal trade, the author called attention to the magnitude of this evil in Great Britain itself and to the arbitrary conduct of customs officials, for example in Connecticut, which tended to provoke rather than to remedy such offences. He then went on to show how fully organized were the customs service and admiralty courts in New England at that time, supported by acts of parliament and manned by officials of royal appointment, and that this system had been established notwithstanding the charters and would scarcely be affected by their recall. The right, too, of the common law courts to issue writs of prohibition against the admiralty courts, of which so much complaint was heard, was not only necessary and a highly valued protection in England where the admiralty jurisdiction was much narrower than it was in the colonies, but provision for it in Massachusetts was made in laws confirmed by the crown and which the recall of the charter could not change. The question of repugnancy of colonial laws to those of England was discussed largely from the language used respecting it in the act of 7 and 8 William III, c. 22, and the conclusion was drawn that no laws to which that term could properly be applied existed in the colonies. In the writer's opinion not only did the system of English liberty exist in them, but they had improved on the liberty of the subject as it then was in the mother country.

As to prospects that the chartered colonies would grow powerful and throw off dependence on England, Dummer scouted the idea. On the other hand he called attention to the drawbacks which inhered in the temptation of royal governors and their appointees to oppression and corruption. How inconsistent, he exclaimed, was the nourishing of tendencies of this kind with that freedom which commerce demanded, that interest from which came the great advantage that England derived from her colonies. Finally, he protested against the method of recalling charters by act of parliament, without giving the accused a proper chance to be heard, as severe and oppressive beyond measure. And neither agents nor any other device in common use gave the colonists proper representation in or before parliament, while the board of trade was continually armed with complaints which it was ready to marshal against them. Under these circumstances the policy which it advocated could be executed only at the sacrifice of liberty.

Neither the board of trade nor any other organ or representative of the British government ever undertook to answer this argument of Dummer. His pamphlet closed a discussion which had been in active progress for more than a generation. It was not seriously reopened until after another forty years had passed. But during that interval and later his pamphlet remained a valued possession, especially of New Englanders, and in the future they could safely turn to it for a statement of their case which needed only slight expansion and readjustment to meet any exigency which might arise. With the exception of Benjamin Franklin, no colonial agent ever rendered a service to his constituents of a nature so valuable and dignified as this. It was, to be sure, the argument of an advocate and some important points were slurred over or omitted. It minimized some perils, as the future was conclusively to show. The only utterances on the other side with which it can properly be compared are the best among the representations of the board of trade relating to the chartered colonies. But the superiority in almost every respect of Dummer's pamphlet to any of these is evident. Their spirit was that of official routine and their substance consisted of facts and views which had been selected and formulated by officials. Of the earlier conditions under which the colonies had been founded they took no account. Of sympathy with the spirit and aspirations which might naturally have developed in these remote communities there is no indication. Everything was viewed from the standpoint of Great Britain and its interests. The same formulæ, largely derived from Randolph and his like, were repeated with tiresome iteration. The difference between that and the spirit and point of view expressed by Dummer was as wide as the Atlantic and there was little prospect in sight of their being harmonized to the mutual satisfaction of the two parties. The course that was now chosen by the British government was to drop the discussion, and to confine action in reference to charters to individual colonies. Until after 1760 no new administrative measures of a general nature which were intended to promote the execution of the acts of trade were adopted. So far as weighty utterances upon the general subject went, the colonists so far had had the last word.

The colonists also, outside New England as well as within it, continued along their accustomed ways. This was evidenced at the very time of which we are speaking by conflicts over jurisdiction between the admiralty courts and common law courts, which arose in several of the colonies but were specially numerous and prolonged in New England. That such conflicts as these were sure to occur we have already seen reason to believe from the experiences of Randolph as collector of the customs in New England before 1689, from the circumstances under which admiralty courts were established in the colonies and their enlarged jurisdiction there and from events in Pennsylvania, Rhode Island and Connecticut a little later.¹ In order to resolve its doubts concerning this jurisdiction, the board of trade in 1702 secured an opinion from Northey, the attorney general, which may be considered as expressing the law of the case.¹ His opinion was that under the original navigation and trade act of 1660 the admiralty courts had jurisdiction only when ships were taken at sea as violators of it; that under the acts of 1663 and 1673 they had no jurisdiction in the plantations, but that the provisions of the statute of 1696 were so sweeping that they gave to the admiralty courts "jurisdiction of all penalties and forfeitures for unlawful trading, either in defrauding the king of his customs, or importing into or exporting out of the plantations prohibited goods, and of all frauds in matters of trade and offences against the acts of trade committed in the plantations." The one exception, according to Northey, to this inclusive jurisdiction was that of trading in unqualified ships,—that is, the navigation law proper; offences against this, at the election of the informer, might be either in a common law or an admiralty court.

¹ Osgood, Am. Colonies in 17th Century, III, 228 et seq.

In the West Indies, from the beginning, the navy had been specially active in the seizure of illegal traders. When such captures were made at sea there was no question that the trials which resulted therefrom should be held in the admiralty courts. But when a capture was made within a port, it was a matter of doubt and controversy whether the case should be tried in an admiralty or a common law court.² A conflict of interests in connection with this question existed between officers of the navy and governors. When vessels were condemned in the admiralty courts the officers of the navy received one-half of the proceeds, while under common law procedure the informer or the party who made the seizure was entitled to only one-third. On the other hand, if the forfeiture was decreed by a common law court, the governor was entitled to a third, while he would receive nothing if the same result was reached by an admiralty court. This was the situation before the passage of the act of 1696 and the general establishment of admiralty courts in the continental colonies which soon followed. Though it was the intention of the originators of this policy that the admiralty courts should have exclusive jurisdiction over cases involving illegal trade, and from the standpoint of the prosecuting officers the advantage of this course was great, a variety of powerful interests in the colonies were opposed to this and the policy met with bitter and prolonged opposition. So few and scattered were the vessels of the navy which were stationed along the American coast that seizures had chiefly to be made by customs officers, and were usually made within ports. From this fact arose almost the certainty that common law jurisdiction would be asserted and the cherished claim of trial by jury vindicated. In the chartered colonies, and wherever their tradition was strongly inherited, such a course was extremely probable and the private interests, even of royal governors, might incline them quietly to favor it.

¹ Chalmers, Opinions. Sir John Cooke, advocate general of the admiralty, rendered an opinion at the same time. As a student and practitioner of the civil law he went further in his claims for the admiralty than did Northey.

² Beer, Old Colonial System, I, 305.

During a decade and more following 1714 the chief collisions between the two jurisdictions occurred in Massachusetts and South Carolina.¹ Nathaniel Byfield, who was judge of admiralty in Dudley's administration, complained of the issue of a prohibition against his court in a case involving a dispute over the ownership of a drift whale, which was said to have been harpooned at sea and then floated to the beach. Sir Charles Hedges, judge of the High Court in England, advised that Byfield proceed no further in this case, as it lay properly within the common law jurisdiction. In defending his claim, Byfield tried to maintain that, as the original purpose of the writ of prohibition was to protect the rights of the crown, it should never be used to destroy those rights, as must necessarily be its purpose when used against the admiralty jurisdiction in the colonies.² He also complained of the sympathy with the superior court shown by Governor Dudley and his son Paul. The latter, he said, was a practitioner before both courts, giving his services where the fees were highest, and arguing before the common law judges against the claims of the admiralty.

John Menzies succeeded Byfield as judge in the New England district. James Smith and Robert Auchmuty were successively advocates before his court. These officials, during a decade or more following 1715, complained often and loudly of encroachments of the common law courts on their jurisdiction. Much correspondence on the subject passed between them and solicitors of the admiralty in England, and on occasion the latter had to moderate or deny extreme claims made by the colonial judge. The admiralty officials thought that the general court had no right to fix the amount of their fees, but on this point, too, they had to yield. Shute, even, was accused of irregularities in his treatment of the admiralty court. Appeals to the High Court in England, or a representation to the secretary of state and the privy council, were urged as means of bringing about reform. Several cases were taken on appeal before the High Court from Menzies' decrees in Massachusetts; one of Oulton and Waldo vs. Savage, involving the question of a ship's registry, has a long history.¹ Cases involving the goods of pirates were also prominent, and in this connection doings of Rhode Island officials came up for criticism. In such cases Archibald Cumming, or whoever else might be agent for the rights of the admiralty in the colonies, was likely to be interested and active. The extension of the admiralty jurisdiction, by the act of 1722, over questions involved in the destruction of the forests was the cause of endless irritation in northern New England, and served further to prejudice those who knew about this against all admiralty officials.

¹ See Admiralty In Letters, above referred to, and a letter from Dummer, the agent, to the board of trade, April 28, 1726. O. P. Mass. C. O. 5/869.

² In this letter Byfield cited Cowell's Interpreter and the argument as used under the early Stuarts, when writs of prohibition were used to protect the rights of the crown against the church.

In 1726 the controversy in Massachusetts culminated in the issue by the superior court of prohibitions against the proceedings of the admiralty court in the case of three vessels seized by the collector at Salem. The admiralty officials now joined in a memorial to the board of trade, which was supported by Shute and by a letter from Dummer, and the facts were also stated at length to the admiralty board. An authoritative opinion was urgently requested which should settle the points at issue. On the advice of the solicitor the cases were referred to Philip Yorke, the attorney general. In August, 1726,² he rendered an opinion in reference to two of the cases. In regard to the first, which concerned the seizure of a vessel that had come from Portugal with goods on board without a cocket, Yorke held that the prohibition should not have been issued. The facts in the second case were not clearly stated; but his opinion in general was that over cases arising merely under 15 Chas. II, c. 7, and which did not fall within any provision of 7 & 8 Wm. III, c. 22, admiralty courts would have no jurisdiction. They also could have no jurisdiction on land or within a port,¹ unless given by act of parliament. The same was true of revenue cases. When his majesty's courts in the plantations were referred to in a statute, by construction they meant the common law courts. This appears to have quieted some of the extreme claims of admiralty officials in New England, and not so much is heard later about conflicts between the two jurisdictions.

¹ See Admiralty Court Libels, vol. 132, 1720 et seq.

² Admiralty In Letters.

In South Carolina, about 1723, the issue lay between Smith, the judge of admiralty, and Governor Nicholson and no special legal questions were involved. It was simply an instance of the abuse and finally the imprisonment of an official by a tyrannical governor, growing out of a personal and political quarrel. It was advised that the lords justices be petitioned to protect Smith.

Commercial treaties and the manipulation of tariffs played a prominent part in mercantilist policy and the trade rivalries of the time. The demand of the Whigs, from the beginning of the struggle with France and even much earlier, had been for as strict a prohibition of trade with that country as possible. The growing jealousy of French influence during the reign of Charles II led to the submission to parliament in 1675 of "A Scheme of the Trade, As it is at present Carried on between England and France," the object of which was to show that the balance was heavily adverse to England.² This contributed to the passage, three years later, of a law prohibiting the importation of French wine, brandy, silks, paper and other commodities, on the ground that the "Wealth and Treasure of the Nation had been much exhausted" by their introduction and consumption. The Tories, of course, were opposed to this policy and procured the repeal of the act in the reign of James II. But after the Revolution the prohibition was renewed and continued until the close of the first war. A slight relaxation followed, but the War of the Spanish Succession restored the prohibition.

¹ Related to this aspect of the subject was the opinion of Northey, in 1716, that the trial of cases under the woolens act belonged to the common law courts and that they were right in issuing prohibitions against the admiralty courts in such cases. His particular reason in this instance was, that the woolens act applied also to Ireland and trials under it there were held in the common law courts. O. P. Mass. C. O. 5/886.

² Ashley, Tory Origin of Free Trade Policy, in Quart. Jour. of Econ., II, 335, and references.

Meantime, in 1703, the Methuen treaty with Portugal was concluded. This was a famous Whig measure prompted by political motives and intended to bring Portugal into the Grand Alliance and furnish an entry for British trade and arms into the Spanish peninsula. It provided that, in return for the removal by Portugal of its prohibition of the import of English woollens, Great Britain would admit Portuguese wines on the payment of two-thirds the duty imposed on French wines. As early as 1678 it had been suggested that the growing taste for French wines should be checked and that for port substituted, because the former had to be paid for in money while the latter could be purchased with British manufactures.¹ The Methuen treaty stands as a fitting preliminary to the occupation of Gibraltar a few years later, the two appearing together as the great initial steps in the process, then beginning, of establishing British control over the Mediterranean.

In the opinion of Whig mercantilists of this period trade with France was wholly bad.² Not only was it trade with the arch-enemy, but it resulted in the introduction of harmful luxuries — especially brandy — and was carried on under conditions which made a heavy adverse balance permanent. The high rates of duty which had been imposed by Colbert, though later reduced, were not soon forgotten. The fact that under the Methuen treaty Portugal suffered from the unfavorable balance and had to discharge its payments in the precious metals, effectually proved the wisdom of that measure in the opinion of British merchants. And yet Englishmen would drink French wines and use goods of their manufacture and the smugglers saw that they got them in sufficient abundance. As the wars progressed the volume of writing from Tory sources against the extreme hostility to the French trade increased. With this appeared also in the writings of such Tories as Dudley North, Child and Davenant suggestions of more liberal views concerning trade in general, though their theory was still fundamentally mercantilist.

¹ Hewins, English Trade and Finance, 132.

² John Cary wrote: "The French trade is certainly our loss, France being like a Tavern with whom we spend what we get by other Nations." "The Ballance of That and the East India Trade is always against us, from whom we have in Goods more than we ship them, and therefore must lessen our Bullion. The Ballance of Spain and Portugal is always in our Favour, . . . As for the Dutch, Germany and Hamburgh, their Ballances are not yet agreed on." "Those who cope with us in our Manufactures are chiefly French." Cary, Essay Towards Regulating the Trade, etc.

When the political reaction came in 1709 against Whig domination and the war, and the Tory government of the last four years of Anne was brought into power, opinions less hostile to France came to the front, and under the lead of Bolingbroke became the basis of the commercial treaty which in 1713 was negotiated with that country. As was the case in 1675, when the policy of commercial war with France was initiated, the commissioners of trade were now called upon to draft such provisions as it was desired to incorporate in law. In 1713 Arthur Moore was probably the leading spirit in this work. The result of the negotiation was agreement upon a treaty, to accompany the treaty of Utrecht, the purpose of which was greatly to promote freedom of trade and thus to encourage good feeling between the nations which had so long been hostile. Its two most important articles were those which guaranteed to both parties the advantages of the most favored nation, and provided that the duties imposed by Great Britain on French goods should not be higher than its duties on the goods of any other country. All prohibitive laws passed since 1664 should be repealed and by France British goods should be rated according to the moderate tariff of 1664.¹

As soon as the terms of the projected treaty were known, a storm of protest was raised by the protected interests which for a quarter of a century had received additional nourishment from the war spirit. The merchants and manufacturers who dealt in silk, woolen and linen joined with the sugar-bakers and distillers and all who were interested in the trade with Portugal in a chorus of denunciation.¹ The struggle was carried into the house of commons, and the press was called actively into requisition on both sides. Under the patronage of Bolingbroke and Oxford the "Mercator" was started and ran as a periodical until near the close of July, 1714. Daniel Defoe was its editor and largely its author, and his abilities were conspicuously shown in defence of the treaty. On the other side, under the patronage of the earl of Halifax, the "British Merchant" supported the Whig cause and the Methuen treaty and denounced all free and liberal dealings with France, the traditional enemy. Henry Martin, Charles King and Joshua Gee were its chief literary sponsors.² When, some years later, after the Whigs were firmly established in power, it was reedited for publication in a three-volume edition, in the list of its subscribers appeared the names of the leading Whigs, nobility, gentry and merchants, of the early Walpole era. In the list one reads the names of John Chetwynd,³ Martin Bladen and the other leading members of the reorganized board of trade, and last but not least the name of Colonel Francis Nicholson.

¹ The high tariff of Colbert was imposed in 1667.

On reading "Mercator" and the other commercial writings of Defoe, one finds that he was a mercantilist, but that he appropriated and was utilizing the more liberal articles of that creed as they had been expounded by the Tory writers to whom reference has just been made.⁴ Like them he argued that trade should be divorced from politics and that national prejudice should not be allowed to control it. The French needed and must take large quantities of British manufactures

¹ Hewins, 139.

² The leading maxims of the "British Merchant" concerning trade were copied and published also in the "Guardian," no. 170.

³ It incidentally appears that there were two other Chetwynds, all in office.

⁴ See especially his "Plan of the English Commerce," which was published in 1728. In this the confidence which he expressed in the superiority of England in the race for commercial and industrial supremacy was so great that it swept away all tendencies toward a policy of timidity or suspicion. To him merchants and tradesmen were the saviors if not already the rulers of England. France does not come in for exceptional or hostile treatment, and the distinction between the island and northern colonies, of which many tried to make so much, was lost in Defoe's enthusiastic appreciation of them all according to their respective capacities. It is breezy, non-technical, and shows that Defoe might easily have become hospitable to the ideas of Adam Smith.

and it was the undoubted interest of Great Britain to trade largely with them in spite of the national struggle which was going on. On all hands it was accepted as a fundamental principle, that trading nations should never prohibit the export of their own manufactures. Letters from Scotland were printed to show that there was a marked difference between her relation to French trade and that of England. French wines and brandies the Scotch would have and salt they must have for their fishery. At the time of the Union the advantages of French trade to Scotland had been insisted upon as something which the northern kingdom was surrendering in order to throw in its cause with England. As to the Methuen treaty or commercial relations with any of the other minor powers, Great Britain need not fear that, because of the agreements she was trying to reach with France, they would cut off her imports. They could not do without British manufactures, while Great Britain could sell its products even though Portugal, for example, did not exist. This, in fact, was the upshot of his argument—the invincible superiority of British manufactures, especially of wool, over those of other countries. Great Britain, therefore, was already so far in the lead that it was for her interest to be liberal. Let her people trade largely with the French, as they necessarily would do, treaty or no treaty. British manufactures in several lines were already superior to those of France. The progress which she had made had been facilitated by the prohibition of British exports for so long a time. Keep back English raw wool and send over freely the manufactured product, and the inferiority of French wool would insure the speedy triumph of England in the competitive struggle.

This robust type of nationalism the Whigs and their writers in the "British Merchant" did not exhibit, and more than a century was to pass before industrial progress and changes in economic thought made an attitude something like this seem natural. The defeat, by a small majority in the commons, of the proposed treaty of 1713, and the wreck of the Tory party which followed the death of Anne, sealed the fate of such proposals as Defoe was advocating. Though, owing largely to the exhaustion of France, a long period of comparative peace was beginning, Great Britain was now committed to Whig guidance. From the first it had been the war party. Its ideas concerning trade were strictly, dogmatically of the politico-economic type. They had been formulated — to speak of no earlier time — during the period of commercial rivalry with the Dutch and had served well their purpose in that connection. George Downing had been one of their formulators, and their most authoritative expression was in the acts of trade, in the increasingly complicated tariff adjustments, in the multitudinous acts and orders which were intended to secure such a distribution of employments within the empire and such relations with all peoples outside as would best conform to the accepted principles of national growth and strength. The continuous increase of the navy and extension of the sweep of its influence were among the prime objects of this policy. War, especially with any dangerous rival, though not always upon issues which were expressly or mainly commercial, was always regarded as one of the most effective means of enabling the empire to surmount crises and reach its destiny. Chiefly for dynastic reasons, war was now to be suspended for a generation, but the politico-economic theory which had guided and profited Great Britain in the past was not abandoned or in any way changed.

The exposition of this theory, which during the period of Whig ascendancy was accepted as authoritative, was contained in the "British Merchant." Following the view which Samuel Fortrey had advanced in 1663 and which had been increasingly accepted as orthodox ever since, they condemned trade with France as freighted with an "overbalance" against England and sure to bring heavy loss without countervailing gain. Standards of wages and living in England were imperilled by the prevailing cheapness in France and by the low standard of living among the masses of its people — the pauper labor argument. During the wars also the necessity of sending large amounts of bullion abroad to pay the expenses of the armies on the continent affected the British balance adversely.¹ Trade with nearly all other countries and quarters of the globe brought in valuable commodities which could not be procured in Great Britain, or yielded a favorable balance in the precious metals either directly or indirectly through roundabout exchanges of commodities. The staple products of France, however, were harmful luxuries or commodities which could better be raised or manufactured at home; if not so, they could be more safely procured elsewhere. Freights also, as between England and France, were sure to be favorable to the latter. The analogy between the attitude of the writers toward France and that of the same body of mercantilists toward the northern colonies on the American continent is striking. The real source of trouble seems to have been that both France and the northern colonies were situated on about the same isothermal lines as Great Britain and therefore they all produced from their extractive industries the same general class of commodities. In the case of France the competition which thus resulted was now intensified by political rivalry and war. The result was a theory of trade which, so far as France was concerned, was so labored and artificial as to be fantastic.

¹ Gee, Trade and Navigation of Great Britain Considered, Ed. of 1738, p. 194. After the Bourbons had been seated on the throne of Spain, and events

After developing their argument through two volumes, the authors of the "British Merchants" concluded as follows: "I hope by this time my Readers are thoroughly convinced of the destructive Consequences of opening the Trade to were leading toward the Family Compact, trade with that country in the eyes of Englishmen fell to an extent into the same category. Owing to political considerations trade with Portugal was good and orthodox while the trade of the rest of the Peninsula was falling into the hands of the enemy. At Paris, of course the opposite view prevailed. The lack of a judge conservator to give a certain protection to British merchants in Spain was much dwelt on. Evidences of the growing hostility of the Spanish to English merchants in Spain were abundant and one can see the relations in their early stages which were leading to the outrages by sea and land of a few years later. It was believed that the French were winning away from the English their chief advantages in trade with Spain. "The Complaints of every one are," said the "British Merchant," that we are not so much favoured in Duties as the French; that we are in a worse condition than we were in the reign of Charles II; that more excessive customs are exacted now than when we were in actual war with the Spanish Nation; that none of our Goods are despatched and that all our trade is stopped; that the French in the meantime have a full Trade, by the connivance of the King of Spain, to the West Indies; and that whole Ships are entirely laden with French Effects for those Countries, besides money which the French themselves send directly for the South Seas." On this view both the Asiento and the establishment of the South Sea Company came in for condemnation.

France, upon the Terms of the Treaty, or indeed upon any Terms whatsoever; that none of our Manufactures, Home or Foreign, can ever be sold in France; and that it is better for us never to have any open Trade with them, but to lay a general Prohibition on all Commodities imported from thence, for they have none that we want or what is not our Interest to be without; on the contrary we have several Commodities which they cannot be without, but must have, and will have, either directly or at second hand; and whatever they amount to is so much clear Gain to the Nation. This, in my Opinion, is the best and most advantageous Foot we can fix our Trade to France upon." It would be difficult to excel this as an effort to combine "war after the war" with that other principle, of "business as usual."¹ The writer, moreover, did not appear to see that by his admission concerning the character of the French demand for British goods he was giving away most of his case. Though the members of the board of trade under the early Hanoverians, so far as they attended to their duties, were administrators and therefore were sure to have their theories modified by contact with actual conditions, they cherished the views just set forth and the general trend of their policy was bound to be in harmony with them. Their views, so far as individual members expressed them, confirm this statement. The reports, representations, instructions, letters of the board are all attuned to this key, though they do not reflect all the extreme notions which appear in the controversial writings of individuals. The same is doubtless true of officials throughout the departments and of Whigs generally, in parliament and out. But the board of trade heard these ideas expressed most continuously and to it the inquirer naturally looks as the chief official exponent of the Whig theory and policy.

Concerning the personnel of the board of trade between 1714 and 1748 little need be said. With the accession of the ¹ A glimpse may be obtained of the discriminations from which British merchants had later to suffer in France as a result of this policy, from a letter of Pultney to the board of trade, dated Feb. 20, 1719/20. Pultney was then serving as commissioner for the adjustment of boundaries with France. B. T. Journal, Minutes and Letter Book, 1719. Commercial reprisals, which were essentially a continuation of the war, now began with Spain and continued with increasing ferocity until they produced the next general struggle.

Whigs to power its membership was entirely changed. Thenceforward, until after the fall of Sir Robert Walpole, its members were chiefly noblemen of no particular significance, placemen and, in two or three instances, officials and members of parliament who were recognized as men of ability and usefulness. At the head of these last stood Martin Bladen. He was a member during almost the entire period — from 1717 to 1746. During most of that time he was also a member of parliament at Westminster and sat for several years as a member of the Irish parliament. He also held minor diplomatic positions,¹ and wherever he was the evidence is clear that he was an active and useful official. Large credit may be given to him for whatever the board of trade did or advocated throughout the period we are now considering. In addition to Bladen, Paul Docminique and Daniel Pultney are specially worthy of mention, though the latter served for only four years — from 1717 to 1721. Docminique, however, was a member from 1714 to 1735 and the evidence goes to show that he was more intimately connected with the work of the board than any one except Bladen. As a member of the West Jersey Society, Docminique may have been brought into closer connection with the affairs of certain of the colonies than was common with British officials.

At the beginning of 1715, and therefore early in the history of the reorganized board of trade, Stanhope, as secretary of state for the southern department, sent to it a "Scheme" relating to the plantations in America.² The opinion of the board concerning it was requested. Though no record of such opinion appears, the document is interesting as a statement of the views of one who may have been a West India merchant concerning the colonies and certain defects in their government which should be remedied. Basing his opinion on the imports from the individual colonies, the writer declared his agreement with the generally accepted view that the tobacco and sugar colonies were the most valuable. He looked askance on the fact that the northern colonies supplied the islands with provisions and some manufactures, receiving their products in return, thus depriving Great Britain of a certain amount of trade which she might utilize to advantage in adjusting her foreign balance. The courts in the plantations came in for extended criticism, as did the conduct of governors on occasion and the liability of the people to suffer from their oppression and the difficulty of securing redress. The cost and delays incident to appeals to Great Britain for redress in such cases, with the frequent references back to the colony for additional evidence and the failure of the board of trade to use the privilege given in its commission to examine witnesses under oath, were well described. The paper closed with certain sweeping criticisms of the board, as it had been, on the ground that none had been appointed to its membership who had perfect and personal knowledge of the plantations, their people and laws. The plantation merchants and those who had served as governors or in other high office in the colonies, in the opinion of the writer, should be represented on the board.

¹ In 1719 he was sent with Pultney to France as a commissioner to adjust the boundaries between the possessions of the two crowns in America; but no agreement was reached. B. T. Plants. Gen., Ent. Book. B. T. Journal, vol. 29.

² N. C. Col. Recs., II, 154-166.

This, it is needless to say, was not followed. Instead of the board becoming more expert in these respects and more hospitable to new ideas it became less so as the years passed. During the years immediately following 1715, in addition to the ordinary routine of business with the colonies separately which was connected with appointments, the drafting of commissions and instructions for governors, and with subjects of every variety which were brought in by letters from the governors, petitions and appeals submitted through agents or in other ways, the board was much occupied with the subject of naval stores. Joshua Gee who, it will be recalled, was a collaborator in the publication of the "British Merchant," after referring to the commercial embarrassments occasioned by the two wars with France, and to measures originating in Russia and Sweden subsequent to the treaty of Utrecht which were intended to prevent Great Britain from being supplied with naval stores from those countries except "at their own Prices and in their own Shipping," states that further consultations were held and the lords of trade were put upon inquiry whether those supplies could not be obtained from the colonies in America. "And accordingly in the Year 1716 they sent for sundry Persons to consult what Methods might be taken to raise and produce them there.”¹ The evidence, therefore is clear that the struggle with France determined the direction which for several years the most important activities of the board of trade and other bodies concerned were to take and that the Whig merchants and Whig government were closely cooperating to secure for Great Britain the greatest practicable independence of foreign states in the production of naval stores. The strengthening of the navy to meet future contingencies, and the organization of trade and industry in such a way as to support the navy with effective national strength, were the policies of these militant Whigs. As we know, the consideration of naval stores always suggested that of manufactures in the colonies, the latter to be checked and discouraged in all available ways in the interest of the former, and also, to a very much larger degree, in order to prevent any competition which might be troublesome to British manufacturers. The subject of the navy and naval stores furnished the appeal to patriotism which powerfully aided the cause of the merchants and manufacturers. The account which follows indicates the course of action which was taken by the board of trade and the circle of ideas within which it moved.

At hearings, continued at intervals during several years, Gee presented much evidence and submitted several memorials on the subject of naval stores and British trade in general. In a memorial presented in 1718 he dwelt on the extent to which the importation of tar from the plantations had reduced its price and affected the balance of trade with Sweden and other Baltic countries, and advocated the application of a similar policy in the case of iron and timber in order to affect similarly the eastland countries in reference to these products and also economize the supply of wood in England. In a longer memorial, presented in 1721, Gee enlarged upon the triumph which the British had won over the Dutch by supplanting them in the carrying trade of western Europe. This achievement he used as a preliminary to an exhortation to the British to continue in the same line of policy as affecting the world at large, and to this end fully to utilize the vast resources of the American colonies in timber and in the capacity for the production of hemp, flax and tar. His demand was that they should be encouraged by bounties and that restraints on the exportation of the more bulky commodities directly from the colonies to the continent of Europe should be taken off. These arguments he elaborated with abundant detail in his "Trade and Navigation of Great Britain Considered," which was published in 1729 and re-issued in several later editions. In this pamphlet even the plan and arrangement of material of the "British Merchant" was followed, though with a much briefer treatment of the foreign trades and a correspondingly greater emphasis on the plantations and the American aspects of the problem. Because of these features, the work of Gee is to be considered as, after the "British Merchant," the next important exposition of the spirit and policy of the militant Whigs.

¹ Gee, op. cit. 196. For an account of the hearings before the board of trade on this subject and the action which was taken, see the chapter on the production of naval stores.

Gee did not specially cherish the prejudices of the West Indian. He recognized as well the advantages which came from the continental colonies and strongly favored the increase of facilities for their trade with the south of Europe, as a means of extending further the triumph of the British over the Dutch in the carrying trade of that region. The large attention which he devoted to naval stores and ship building had to do exclusively with the northern colonies, and he clearly saw that, in both war and peace, the island colonies depended for their very existence on the supplies which were brought to them from the continent. But, like all the rest, Gee would check all important developments toward manufacturing in the north, though he did advocate the making there of the cruder products of iron. Another new demand which he voiced was that for the encouragement of the production of raw silk in the colonies south of the Delaware river, a policy which proved futile in the end, but one which was further emphasized in the founding of Georgia.

No one surpassed Gee, if any equaled him, in the thorough-going expression which he gave to the degree of industrial and social dependence in which the colonies were kept or wherein it was desirable to keep them.¹ Speaking of the plantation provinces, all but one-fourth of their total product, he said, was sent to Great Britain and what they carried back was wholly of its manufacture. Their savings were deposited in England and thither they sent their children to be educated. When planters had accumulated a sufficiency, they came to England to live and only an overseer was left on the plantation, the whole produce then being remitted home. In addition, plantations were often mortgaged to British investors and the high rates of interest were added to the profits of the trading class. In these few statements were sketched the chief characteristics of absenteeism in the West Indies. As to the northern colonies, they were under greater difficulties in making returns to England, and therefore clothing and other goods of "ordinary Sort sells with them, and when they are grown out of Fashion with us, they are new fashioned enough there." Young merchants also went thither as factors and, when they had got a start, returned home and others took their places, a constant interchange, like that of bees in a hive, being kept up. The immense gains which came from the increase of shipping and seamen in the plantation trade were also emphasized, and it was stated that though, in the recent French wars, the capture or destruction of British ships by the enemy had been very great, shipbuilding had kept pace with the losses. But "our own Interest is not [to be] mistaken for that of the Planters; for every Restraint and Difficulty put upon our Trade with them makes them have Recourse to their own Products which they manufacture, a thing of great Consequence to us and ought to be guarded against. For if they are supplied with their own Manufactures, one great Part of the Advantage we should otherwise receive is cut off; and therefore, . . . if Care is taken to find them Employment and turn their Industry another Way, now in their Infancy, it may be done with very little Trouble; and it is hoped the Regulations proposed in this Discourse would entirely effect it."

¹ See his pamphlet, ed. of 1738, p. 149 et seq.

In order to complete our view of this system of benevolent despotism, the commercial and industrial aspects of which were so aptly described by Gee, we have only to refer to his statement of the policy which he would follow in reference to colonial legislation.¹ He was well aware that by means of pressure on governors, by the passage of temporary laws, and in other analogous ways, all made possible by delays and other failures in the process of disallowance, many advantages were lost by Great Britain. Owing to this and other causes, it had been impossible — and fortunately was ever to remain so — to attain the ideal of mercantilism and put this cut-and-dried scheme into full operation. But Gee was ready to take the decisive step toward this result by applying to the colonies the system of the Poynings act in Ireland, and, except in cases of emergency legislation for defence, to require that no law should be passed there until a copy of the same had been examined and approved by the king in council. The results of this policy in Ireland were well known and Gee, like all mercantilists, was well aware of the likeness between the position of Ireland and the colonies in the British commercial system, and the effect of the measures which he advocated would have been to make their positions virtually identical. To this as an ideal militant Whiggism was committed. The board of trade furnished a sort of clearing house for the expression of ideas and proposing of plans largely in harmony with it. There was much in the relations between Great Britain and the northern colonies which made a more stringent policy seem desirable. Faults, as they existed, seemed most serious to those who were most fully aware of them, whether as merchants or as administrators. Among these were members of the board and Gee, a merchant-theorist, was one of its most trusted advisers in the line of his specialty for a decade after the accession of the Hanoverians. The trend of his thought we have seen.

At about the time when Gee was active, a very comprehensive treatise, entitled "A Survey of Trade," was published.² Its authorship has been attributed to the ironmaster, William Wood, the protégé of the government in the contract for coining Irish halfpence and farthings and made famous by Swift in the Drapier Letters. In this book, which was intended to be a standard Whig treatise on British trade in all its aspects, heavy drafts were made on Davenant's writings, but the whole was cast in a narrower mould, with a spirit of stolid antagonism toward France and a reassertion of mercantilist orthodoxy in reference to all subjects affecting trade and the colonies in their commercial relations.

¹ Ibid., 157-159.

² The date of its publication was 1718.

The discussion of naval stores, which had proceeded so vigorously, led in 1719 to the introduction of a bill into parliament for their further encouragement.¹ But the British ironmasters procured the insertion of clauses, one in the commons and the other in the lords, which provided that there should be no manufacture in the colonies of iron ware, of any kind, out of pigs or bars, and that no forge for the making or bars or rods should be built in the colonies. So disappointed were the colonial supporters of the bill by the introduction of these provisions, that they were glad to see it dropped altogether. The agitation of the subject, however, was continued, as involving one of the most important issues of the time, and in 1722 the act, referred to elsewhere, was passed which insured the continuance of existing favors to the industry for sixteen years longer.²

In 1721 the board of trade, at the command of the king, submitted one of its elaborate reports³ on the condition of the continental colonies, a document to which reference under the subject of naval stores has already been made. This was signed by Chetwynd, Bladen, Docminique and Ashe. In it were doubtless summed up the chief results, general and specific, of the inquiries and deliberations of the board in reference to this group of colonies since its reorganization in 1714. Every colony, from Nova Scotia to South Carolina, was considered separately, Rhode Island and Connecticut, owing to lack of information, receiving very brief mention. The existing condition of the respective colonies and their characteristics both as to trade and government were sketched. Taking the American colonies as a whole, the board, using the unreliable custom-house returns of the time, estimated that their trade, including their products which were reexported, furnished employment to one-third of the shipping which annually cleared from the United Kingdom. Exports to the continental colonies exceeded imports thence by about £200,000 per annum. This debt fell upon the provinces north of Maryland and they were enabled to discharge it by their trade with the island colonies and to Europe in commodities which were not enumerated. This was a good showing, but the board was persuaded that the balance in England's favor might be greatly improved if the production of naval stores of all kinds was sufficiently encouraged and also the production of commodities which Great Britain needed but which she could procure only at a disadvantage in foreign countries. If this course were pursued, the trade of the empire might become still more concentrated by the northern colonies becoming able to pay their balance to England without carrying on a trade with foreign countries which in some respects was detrimental to the mother kingdom. On the minor issue of rice in Carolina, the board was in favor of permitting its export direct to southern Europe.

¹ Macpherson, Annals of Commerce, III, 72.

² An interesting pamphlet on this subject appeared in 1720 under the title of "A Letter to a Member of Parliament concerning the Naval Stores Bill of 1719." This was an argument against the policy just mentioned and in favor of the value to England of the crude manufacture of iron in the plantations.

³ N. Y. Col. Docs., V, 591-630.

Turning to questions of territory and government, the board dwelt at length on the dangerous extension of French settlement and claims in the Mississippi Valley and deplored the neglect which had allowed this to go so far.¹ The board now considered it imperatively necessary to meet this by building forts along the frontier and by specially strengthening the colonies on the north and south. The board was fully aware of the weakness of Nova Scotia and urged that steps be taken to settle it and that four regiments of foot be stationed there. The same number of troops should also be stationed in South Carolina, and forts should be built on its principal rivers. Spotswood's suggestion that a fort should be built on Lake Erie was approved, as also the plan which Burnet was forming for occupying Niagara. The board was also in favor of extending settlements beyond the mountains. The strengthening in every way of friendly relations with the Indians — especially the Iroquois — was strongly urged, by presents, by missions, even by intermarriages, but above all by trade. As a means of securing all these objects the board again recorded its conviction that, in the interest of trade and political control, all the charters should be recalled. It had fault to find with the laws and administration in all the colonies relating to trade, quit rents, the taking up of land, the preservation of the forests, the discharge of official duties by deputy. To remedy these and other abuses, to strengthen defence and promote efficiency the board urged the appointment of a captain general over colonies, to reside possibly in New York and to be constantly attended by two or more councillors, deputed presumably by the governor and council of each colony. With the help of these, quotas of men or money, it was thought, might be raised. In this purely executive or autocratic form appeared the favorite plan of the British government for securing colonial union, the first which had been put forward since the issue of the commission to Lord Bellomont. Chalmers is authority for the statement that the earl of Stair was requested to accept the office of captain general but declined, and then the plan was laid on the shelf.¹ The final recommendation of the board was that its president should have, under the king, the full charge of plantation business, as was the case with the departments of the treasury and admiralty. In this way the confusion occasioned by the distribution of colonial business between the offices of the secretary of state, the privy council and the board of trade would be avoided.

¹ They acknowledged special indebtedness to a report by William Keith on this subject. It had also been discussed in a memorial by a Mr. Harris, whom the board had consulted. The negotiations of Bladen and Pultney in France had touched upon the same subject. O. P. Plants. Gen., 1719.

Though the board in the prosecution of its imperial policy had not committed itself to colonial taxation, its members were familiar with the idea. If they needed further reminders on this subject, Archibald Cummings furnished them by submitting a "Scheme" in 1723 in which he proposed to tax about everything possible.² His purpose was to secure means for the support of some six thousand troops on the American continent, and he was moved to make the proposal at this time by Râle's war in northern New England. His "Scheme" provided that the drawbacks on all foreign linens, canvas, calicoes, muslins, tea, coffee, pepper, paper and fruits exported to the plantations be taken off and that the amount thus saved to British revenue — estimated at £40,000 per annum — be used for the purpose indicated. About £30,000 proclamation money Cummings proposed to raise by a stamp duty in America. He was the first to propose import duties on a large scale on the trade between the foreign West India islands and the northern colonies — on rum, molasses, cotton, cocoa, indigo; also on wines from the Canaries, Madeira and the continent of Europe. A tax of 6d. per acre should be collected annually on all unimproved land which had been granted in the colonies, and forty acres from the ungranted land there should be bestowed as a bounty on every soldier who should be brought into service under this plan. Considering the date when this plan was formulated, it shows that the minds of certain officials and merchants at least, with the help, when needed, of precedents drawn from their enemy, the French, could speedily reach very sweeping conclusions when once they were set going along the lines of parliamentary autocracy. Viewed from the practical standpoint, however, Cummings' "Scheme" at the time was simply a curiosity. It was filed away, whether or not for future reference would depend on conditions and the degree of interest on the part of later official minds concerning such matters.

¹ Introd. to the Revolt of Am. Colonies, II, 43; Dickerson, op. cit., 215.

² B. T. Journal, Nov. 26, 1723; O. P. Plants. Gen. Recd., Dec., 1722, read Nov., 1723.

The Whig mercantilists, in their efforts to create a closed and self-sufficient empire, and especially to exclude the traditional enemy, found two special points of leakage, Newfoundland and the West Indies, the two extremes of the colonial area. Owing to the lack of established government in Newfoundland and the presence of so many nationalities among the fishermen who visited those seas, all sorts of European goods were said to be carried thence to the other colonies. In March, 1716, the board of trade prepared a representation on the abuses of this kind which were connected with the fisheries in those seas. This was not the first or the last that was heard of complaints of this nature. Under the circumstances it was also inevitable that the trade which was growing up between the northern colonies, or even the British islands, and the foreign West Indies should be viewed with suspicion in England. Some correspondence about illegal trade at Martinique, and possibly elsewhere, led to the issue of a circular letter to the governors, in August, 1714, requiring them to see that no such trade was carried on.¹ Early in 1717 a letter was received from the governor of Barbadoes mentioning the trade between the English colonies and the French and requesting directions concerning it. The board of trade found that the fifth and sixth articles of the treaty of neutrality of 1686 between England and France prohibited this, and a letter was sent to Secretary Methuen asking whether that treaty was still in force.² Again, in 1724, Cummings brought this subject up and some correspondence followed. At the close of 1730³ it came up once more in decisive form, not only in connection with its illegal aspects but with its economic significance in certain broad relations, and this time it was not permitted to rest until a serious effort at readjustment had been made.

The development of manufacturing in the colonies also continued, as ever, to be a subject of continuous solicitude on the part of the mercantilists in and about the board of trade. In the deliberations of that body and in the correspondence of governors, as has been indicated, it occupied a place nearly as prominent as that of naval stores. As we have repeatedly seen, these two, like the woolen and linen industries in Ireland, were always considered together as mutually conditioning one another. The policy of encouraging the production of naval stores was always urged, not only in the interest of the navy and the mercantile marine, but as a means of diverting the people of the northern colonies from manufacturing. Like sugar, tobacco and rice, naval stores were treated as the products of staple extractive industries, to the pursuit of which it was the desire of the imperialistic mercantilists to limit the economic activities of the colonists. They were to be kept as exclusively as possible an agricultural people, and Great Britain was to do their manufacturing for them, using their products so far as was necessary, as well as her own, in the process. In the transportation of these products, as well as her own, across sea the colonists, according to their ability, were to share. Foreign shipping was not to visit the colonies, but colonial shipping when laden with non-enumerated commodities, or commodities in which trade south of Cape Finisterre was permitted, might visit alien countries. Therefore, so long as all American products were not enumerated, the colonies were not excluded from the opportunity to trade legally with foreign peoples. Illegal trade, whether extensive or not, also contributed to the same end, and therefore the dependencies of the empire were not commercially shut within a closed circle. Until near the close of the colonial period, they both legally and actually enjoyed much freedom.

¹ See B. T. Journal; Acts P. C. Col., 1680-1720, p. 559.

² These provided that English vessels caught trading or fishing in French possessions — stress of weather excepted — should be confiscated, and the same restriction was imposed on the French in their relations with the English.

³ B. T. Journal.

Analogous conditions existed in the case of American manufactures.¹ Since, irrespective of the navigation act, shipping of a minor and subsidiary sort was absolutely necessary for local and intercolonial traffic, so without manufacturing in some form the colonists who settled along the Atlantic seaboard could not have existed. The preparation of their food, the clothing of their families, the clearing of the forests, the building of their houses and churches, the construction of roads, the building of boats, ships and vehicles, every process of individual, family or community activity demanded tools, machines or even mills for their prosecution. The limited supplies of all kinds which were brought by colonists when they came from Europe were soon worn out or exhausted, and in a large proportion of cases, especially in the northern part of the continent, their places were filled not by imports from Europe but by the products of colonial labor. The colonists came from advanced industrial communities of the time in Europe. Artisans of varied skill always occupied a place among their members and their labor always formed a part of the total activity of the colonies.

Homespun industries, carried on in the households and with a minimum of specialized skill, were an original and always the most important of the forms of manufacturing which went on in the colonies. The spinning wheel and the hand loom were their most characteristic implements, and, by means of them, were produced the larger part of the textiles which were worn by colonists of lower and medium ranks, north and south, and especially in the remoter inland communities. Wool was the chief material used in these, and to a lesser extent flax, hemp and cotton. "Hardware, tools and implements, furniture, clothing, shoes, caps, and bedding were made in the family. Many southern plantations conducted, with slave labor, household manufactures sufficiently extensive to supply what under a different labor system would have been a community market."¹

¹ In the preparation of the sketch which follows I am greatly indebted to the very thorough work of Victor S. Clark, on the History of Manufactures in the United States, published by the Carnegie Institution. The earlier works, like Bishop, have also been abundantly used, together with the Colonial Laws and the references which are scattered through the Colonial Papers.

Classifying industries according to the market, when home-spun manufactures had developed so far as to enter local or neighborhood exchange, they became domestic-commercial. Other industries, like tanning, saddlery, glass-making, brick-making, the manufacture of hollow ware and bar iron, of soap and candles, were domestic-commercial from the beginning. Hats fall partly in this and partly in the next class. Many other commodities with a similar history might be mentioned. The extent of the domestic market within which they were salable varied with every commodity or with any given commodity at different times and places, from the neighborhood where it was produced to the adjacent section of a colony or to an entire colony or a group of colonies which were subject to similar economic conditions. To the two classes of goods just mentioned doubtless belonged by far the larger part of the manufactures produced in the colonies.

The third class was the foreign-commercial manufactures. They were produced for the foreign market, and this for the most part meant the island colonies and Europe. But under the existing means of communication the remoter southern colonies were so far away from New England that these two sections might well be considered as foreign to one another. Transportation of these products was almost wholly by sea, and in general a scale of production and transportation facilities adequate to reach such distant markets was not developed until the middle or later colonial period. To commodities of this class belonged lumber, pitch, tar, iron, flour, salt, provisions, potash and rum. Ships, sent to the European market, might also be included in this class. With the exception of rum, none of these commodities was affected by the Indian trade.

¹ Clark, op. cit., 92.

It was not until about the close of our colonial period that the inventions were made which led to the development of the factory system in England. Steam was not yet available as a motor power and, on both sides of the Atlantic, water, mechanical and animal power were all that was available. This fact helped to determine the location of manufacturing enterprises and also to limit the scale on which they were prosecuted. Factories did not exist, and apart from the household the workshop was the typical form of industrial establishment. The managers of these in some cases gave out work to be done or completed in households or elsewhere. Grist mills, saw mills, tanneries, breweries, ropewalks, tar kilns, paper mills, glass works, iron furnaces, slitting mills, potash and pearl ash works, and the like, all fall under the class of workshops. With the incoming of the Scotch-Irish the manufacture of linen by methods to which they had been accustomed at home was established in several localities. The Germans in Pennsylvania developed iron and glass works on a considerable scale.

The scale on which manufacturing developed was affected or determined not only by the availability of raw material and facilities for transportation, but by the cost of labor, the abundance of capital, the condition of the circulating medium, density of population, and by everything which affected the extent of the market and the intensity of demand. Wars and causes affecting general prosperity and credit also had their influence. From time to time local and sectional crises and periods of depression occurred. The amount of available capital was small and, like everything else in the colonies, it was widely dispersed. Labor was affected by analogous conditions and, as land was so abundant and returns therefrom so easy and relatively large, wages averaged high. This was especially true as compared with Europe, while the purchasing power of money, when not affected by depreciated bills of credit, was great. Here lay the secret of the attractiveness of the colonies to the common man.

The largest fortunes were invested in land or in foreign trade, not in manufactures. The corporation as a means of bringing small accumulations together for joint enterprises was only slightly developed or utilized. There was general lack of specialization. Many things were done on a small scale, but nothing on a large one. There was a general diffusion of manufacturing throughout the colonies, especially in the northern and middle sections, and this had grown up chiefly to satisfy local and sectional demand for things which it would not be safe for any community to be left without.

The colonial legislatures were, of course, aware of these conditions and made many efforts, temporary or continuous, to promote or regulate manufactures by statute. In a loose and unsystematic way the protectionist ideas of the time were held by the colonists and were applied in their legislation for the encouragement of domestic industries. The favorite policy, especially for the encouragement of textiles, was to grant bounties for either the raw materials or the finished product. Flax and hemp and linen were the objects of such favors in very many of the colonies. Occasionally woolens were the object of similar treatment; potash and salt also. The introduction of new industries in general or of specified industries was not infrequently encouraged by grants of land, on the part of towns and colonies. The setting up of a grist mill or saw mill was naturally rewarded in this fashion; in the same way the making of salt, brick or glass. Public loans were also made for the same or similar purposes, such action being taken also by localities as well as colonies. Lotteries were sometimes resorted to for raising the money thus loaned. Monopolies and patents were sometimes used as encouragements or rewards, and the compulsory use of a variety of staple products as money had a similar influence. Embargoes on exports, as well as export duties, were frequently used as means of guaranteeing a stock of materials or fostering domestic industry. The low import duties of the time were considered, especially by Great Britain, to have incidentally a protective influence. Frequently such duties were levied on goods coming into a colony from neighboring colonies, and sometimes a petty tariff war would result. Tonnage duties were frequently levied in such a way as to favor the vessels of the colony which imposed them. The colonial legislation for the encouragement of manufactures was large in amount and varied, and, though many of the acts were temporary, its purpose is clear and its total effect was a certain encouragement of colonial industries which were properly deemed necessary to the security and progress of communities, which, like these, were located on a remote continent. As population, especially toward the middle of the eighteenth century, rapidly increased and the open spaces were filled and means of transportation improved, the volume of colonial manufactures grew. The extension of settlement toward the interior also necessitated a more self-sufficient economy for such communities, because they were excluded from easy communication with the coast.

Attention must now be directed to the attitude of the British government and its agents toward these industries and the policy which the colonies were instinctively following for their promotion.¹ Their attitude of suspicious watchfulness has already been indicated, but specific proofs of its nature and growth must now be presented. Wool being the great British staple, anxiety was specially strong concerning the progress of sheep raising and the manufacture of wool in the colonies. This, as we have seen, led to the legislation by parliament in 1699 on the subject. The board of trade in a report to the queen, in October, 1703, on the subject of the woolen industry in general, expressed the opinion that of late years great numbers of people were being enticed over into the plantations and that there they clothed themselves and their children with the woolen manufactures of America. Workmen also were carried over on specious pretences of a more easy livelihood in the colonies and there, in spite of the prohibition of the woolens act and contrary to the proper design of such settlements, they so improved their skill that they were making as good druggets as were manufactured in England.² In the following year Brenton, then surveyor of the woods, wrote to the board at length concerning the wool industry in New England. He said that the greatest number of sheep in that section were kept on the islands of Nantucket and Martha's Vineyard and the islands of Narragansett bay and Massachusetts bay. The reason for this was that wolves were numerous on the mainland. In the inland towns, except when serious attempts were made to enforce the wool act, they raised but few sheep, because it could not be done without shepherds, and these because of high wages they could not afford. The inhabitants protested that the wool act was not intended to hinder the transport of wool by water within the same colony and so it had been found impossible to prevent its being carried from the islands to the mainland. Since the passage of the act of 1699 the numbers of sheep in the inland towns had increased and the inhabitants worked up their wool, though they had formerly sold it for money with which they had bought finer English woolens.¹

¹ For this the material in the B. T. Journals and Entry Books and Original Papers of the Series Plantations General, and in the series B. T. Commercial is abundant. The chapter on this subject in Lord's Industrial Experiments is also helpful.

² B. T. N. Eng., Oct. 28, 1703, B. T. Journal.

Soon after Bridger was appointed surveyor he wrote about the "dangerous growing manufacture of wool in New England" and the large importation of wool-combs and cards for the purpose.² The absurd extremes to which some merchants were ready to go was now illustrated by the proposal to force the planters to clothe their servants and slaves in coarse woollen cloths of British make, for which they should barter commodities such as naval stores. To this the board replied that such a policy could not be executed without the consent of the assemblies, and that British goods should be recommended by their goodness and cheapness rather than imposed by a policy which would meet with general opposition.³ The board, however, prematurely expressed itself as sanguine that labor was being so diverted to naval stores that the woollen industry would be abandoned. But the letters of Partridge, Dudley and Bridger showed that this was a vain hope. Partridge stated, after the war had well begun, that New England no longer had any returns to make for English woolens and must manufacture for herself or go naked. War had also cut off her market for fish in Spain and war with the Indians had deprived her of the fur trade.¹ In 1708 Bridger wrote that the people had returned to the woolen manufacture, "so that not one in 40 but wears his own carding and spinning." They would not believe him when he told them they could make more at tar and pitch than they could at carding and spinning. The next year he wrote that the woolen industry was steadily increasing, while the war was retarding the production of naval stores.² It was, of course, natural that all officials who were engaged in stimulating the production of naval stores should lay all the emphasis that was possible on the growth of manufactures. Dudley, in 1709, wrote that, owing to high prices and lack of dealings with England, her woolen trade with New England was falling off and, unless the lumber trade and ship building were encouraged, the woolen trade would grow less every year in spite of the increase of population. Banister, in his "Discourse on the Trade of New England," written in answer to queries from the board of trade, clearly stated the view that high prices and the unfavorable balance of trade with England, together with heavy duties on naval stores there, had forced New England, about nine years before, to a very decided increase in the manufacture of woollens. The lack of coin, with the disorganizing attempt to substitute paper credit, had also contributed to this result.

¹ E. B. New Eng. C. O. 5/911. The quality of wool raised in the colonies was always very inferior to that produced in England.

² Lord, 130.

³ E. B. Plants. Gen., Dec. 3, 1706.

From New York, about 1708, came reports written by Lord Cornbury and Caleb Heathcote,³ that the same unfavorable balance of trade had occasioned a considerable development of woolen manufactures on Long Island and in Connecticut. Heathcote stated that three-quarters of the linen and woolen which the people wore was made by themselves and, if it was not stopped, they would carry it much further. Cornbury mentioned at some length the varieties of woolen fabrics which were made in New York. In 1705 Logan wrote to Penn about the trouble into which an inhabitant of Chester had inadvertently fallen because he had brought two packages of wool from Maryland. Penn replied that he would try to have the act amended, though in England they were very jealous of encouraging manufactures in the colonies.¹ The low price of tobacco in Virginia and Maryland at this time was having a similar tendency there also. In November, 1708,² Perry and other Virginia merchants attended the board of trade, the occasion being the arrival of a letter from Jennings, president of that colony, dwelling on the low price of tobacco and the necessity that supplies of clothing should be sent from England as the only effectual means of keeping the people from manufacturing linen and woollens. The merchants stated that the immediate occasion of the difficulty was a delay of some seven months in the sailing of the Virginia fleet having on board a large quantity of British manufactures. They also took occasion to say that, unless the high duty on the importation of tobacco into England was removed, they did not see how a stop could be put to the growth of manufacturing in Virginia.

¹ B. T. New Eng.

² Quoted by Lord, 131. Down to the close of 1713 or later — see Cal. of Treasury Papers — Bridger continued to write in this strain.

³ N. Y. Col. Docs, V, 59, 63; Lord, 131.

And so the discussion continued, its purpose being largely to justify such a limited utilization of the resources of the colonial territory as would best enrich and strengthen Great Britain and prepare her better for the rivalries of Europe and the world, and especially for the struggle, dynastic, military and commercial, in which she was engaged with France. The examples which have just been given are drawn from the years immediately following the passage of the woolen act and relate specially to that commodity. At that time wool was the colonial industry which was chiefly worrying British merchants and officials. As immigration into the colonies increased and population grew, other industries began to attract attention. The discussion was continued with even greater energy after the treaty of Utrecht and far on into the period of peace that followed. During the years 1715 and 1716 the board of trade was much occupied with the causes of an alleged decline in the British woolen industry.³ During nearly two decades after the accession of the Hanoverians the subject of naval stores, as we have seen, was uppermost, and when that was under discussion the topic of colonial manufactures lay just in the background and might be brought to the front at any time. In 1715 Governor Hunter, with his usual common sense, wrote that the farmers and poorer sort of country people wore no clothing except of their own manufacture, and a law to oblige such as were not able to wear English manufactures to go to the expense of doing so would be a law requiring them to go naked.¹ In 1720 Armstrong, who was sent by Bridger's successor to be deputy surveyor of the woods, wrote very pessimistically about New England, stating that the assemblies were encouraging experts to come and teach them how to manufacture their own products, that they were now well able to manufacture woolen, linen, iron, copper and other commodities and nothing could divert them from it. "I presume," he added, "in a few years they will set up for themselves independent of England."² The enterprise of Spotswood in Virginia, with statements from Byrd and others, called attention to iron and its possibilities. In its report of 1721 the board of trade found New Hampshire safely committed to fishery, lumber and naval stores, but in Massachusetts a considerable variety of manufactures had been established, from necessity, it supposed, and not choice.³ "The most natural method of curing this evil would be to allow them all proper encouragement for the importation of Naval Stores and minerals of all kinds." Respecting no other colony did the board express anxiety on the score of existing manufactures, though it was aware of the large deposits of iron, especially in Pennsylvania, and of the desirability that the yield of these in proper form, as well as their lumber, should be taken off, so that the Pennsylvanians would "be diverted from the thought of setting up any manufactures of their own."⁴

¹ Penn-Logan Corresp., II, 8, 68. Clark, 23.

² B. T. Journal.

³ Defoe denied the truth of this.

As the impression conveyed by many was that the woollens act was not being satisfactorily obeyed, in November 1728, an order came from the privy council directing the board to lay before it the best information to be obtained of any silk, linen or woollen manufactures erected in any of the plantations.⁵ Sir William Keith, Spotswood, Shute, Robert John-

¹ N. Y. Col. Docs., V, 460.

² Quoted by Lord, 136.

³ N. Y. Col. Docs., V, 598.

⁴ Ibid., 604.

⁵ B. T. Journal; N. J. Arch. V, 203-206.

son — all ex-governors — and Gee were summoned. Keith presented a written memorial, in which he stated that the colonists who lived south of Pennsylvania, except in Somerset county, Maryland, were too fully employed in the production of tobacco and rice to manufacture either wool or flax to advantage. The people to the north of that Mason and Dixon's line, which has signified so much in American history, kept some sheep, raised a little flax, and at odd times kept the children, servants and women in their families at work making from these coarse cloth, bags, halters and plough traces for the use of the household and on the farm. The lack of facilities for land carriage from remote inland settlements to the market made it necessary for them to limit their crops of corn and grain and that left them time to spare for the working up of wool and flax for domestic use. Keith also called attention to the high cost of labor as an effective check on large-scale manufacturing in the colonies. His view was a true and liberal one, though he admitted the desirability also of a diversion into the production of naval stores.¹ Spotswood said that in Virginia servants were employed in household manufactures of wool, but never when the returns from tobacco equalled the cost of its cultivation. Shute, who had written in moderate terms on earlier occasions, expressed himself concerning conditions in New England to the same general effect as Keith and Spotswood. Johnson said he did not think there was any danger of the establishment of woolen or linen manufactures in either of the Carolinas if the production of naval stores was encouraged. Gee reported what he had heard about Germans in Pennsylvania raising both hemp and flax and manufacturing some linen for sale. All agreed with the opinions of the ex-governors, and the board prepared a representation to that general effect. In that document,² while following chiefly the statement of Keith, they used the suggestion of Gee as the basis for a recommendation that care should be taken to prevent the growth of the manufacture of linen in the colonies. As linen had been made the sole specialty of Ireland, so apparently naval stores should be the sole specialty of the northern colonies. The board would not prevent the poor settlers from clothing themselves, but yet it thought the wool act should be extended so as to prevent such goods from being exposed for sale.

¹ On similar grounds, in 1729 Keith urged the encouragement of the production of pot and pearl ashes in the colonies, and that industry gradually became the object of some attention. See Keith's reply to an inquiry by Thomas Lowndes, N. J. Arch. V, 246.

² N. J. Arch. V, 207.

It was at this juncture, in connection with the naval stores act of 1729 and of the discussion of colonial manufactures, that Spotswood gave the board of trade an able account of his enterprise in Virginia.¹ As he was engaged in the production of iron, as well as in experiments with tar and hemp, his work lay in both the two spheres of manufacturing and the production of naval stores. The peculiarity of iron was that it was or might be a purely manufactured product or a form of naval stores, and it was at this time that iron first appeared prominently on the scene. Spotswood said that when he first went to Virginia, on every man-of-war were two Russians learning the principles of navigation, and this was permitted for the sake of the hemp which England was to buy from Russia. Then he thought of the court which England had to pay to Sweden in order to secure naval supplies. These thoughts, together with a recent speech from the throne, moved him to see if iron, tar and hemp could not be produced in Virginia. He invested largely himself, went into partnership with others and induced all the colonists to embark on the production of these stores. He took up 55,000 acres of crown land, of which 40,000 were devoted to hemp, tar and pitch and the remaining 15,000 acres, because of deposits, were devoted to iron. On the first tract over one hundred Germans were settled, they being provided with houses and all necessities for the support of their families for five years. They were charged no interest on these advances and no rent for three years, but afterwards a pound of hemp or flax per acre. Spotswood also had a large plantation stocked with the best of his negroes and managed by an Englishman, who instructed them in hemp raising. In this he found the best results from wild seed grown in America. His tar burners succeeded well, with the use of knots and decayed limbs, until the new method prescribed by act of parliament compelled them to stop; it destroyed trees too fast and could be made to yield no satisfactory results.

¹ O. P. Plants. Gen., March, 1712/8; B. T. Journal.

Spotswood claimed to have set up the first furnace in America for making pig iron. The quality of what he produced had been approved in England and partnerships were formed in Bristol and Birmingham to enlarge its production. Some encouragement was also given in Virginia. But, because results came more slowly than was expected, the partners lost interest and Spotswood took over the entire business. The bounty act also expired and bills were passed in Virginia forbidding any one to take up more than 1000 acres of land and laying a duty on the importation of negroes. These various causes, together with the recall of Spotswood in the midst of his plans, discouraged the enterprise. In 1724 he went to England and claimed to have helped convince the board of trade that tar could not be made with the class of labor in the plantations according to the new method, and had urged that tar burners be brought from Finland for the purpose. But he had been so rebuffed that he said he had lost interest in hemp and tar, though he should continue the production of pig iron.

This suggestive statement by Spotswood was followed by the presentation, through Viscount Townshend, of another "Discourse" addressed by Keith to the king. This was much longer than its predecessor and dealt with the subject of colonial settlement as well as that of trade.¹ There is evidence that this essay had been written three years or more before and that Martin Bladen had seen it and had expressed to Townshend the purpose of adding some further hints on the subject.² What he may have written is not known, but that it would have been in substantial agreement with the views of Keith can hardly be doubted.

¹ O. P. Plants. Gen., Dec. 31, 1728. This is printed in N. J. Arch. V, 215-230. The same paper is also printed in N. C. Col. Recs., II, 626.

² N. C. Recs., II, 625. In 1740 Keith published his writings under the title of "A Collection of Papers and other Tracts." In this volume the essay in question, under a modified title and with a long addition in defence of the issues of paper currency in the colonies, occupies a prominent place. The fulsome introduction, which appeared in all the versions, might well have provoked the satire of Thackeray. Speaking of George II and the courtiers who surrounded him, Keith declared that the paths of virtue and honor, with a strict adherence to truth, would be the only avenues of access to the sovereign's esteem and the only claims to favor. Patriotism and liberty were the watchwords and inspiration of sovereign, ministers and people.

Upon the benefits which came to the parent state from trade with the colonies he dwelt at length, stating them under several distinct heads. The acts of trade he believed should be strictly executed and all products of the colonies for which the manufactures and trade of Great Britain had a steady demand should be enumerated. The same should be done in the case of every valuable and rare product for which there was a demand in Europe, so that by passing through Great Britain they might assist her in the balance of trade with other countries. The colonies also should be absolutely restrained from laying any manner of duties on shipping or trade from Europe or upon European goods transported from one colony to another. "Every Act of a Dependent Provincial Government," wrote Keith, "ought to Terminate in the Advantage of the Mother State, unto whom it owes its being and by whom it is protected in all its valuable privileges. Hence it follows that all advantageous Projects or Commercial Gains in any Colony which are truly prejudicial to or inconsistent with the Interest of the Mother State must be understood to be illegal and the practice of them unwarrantable, because they contradict the End for which the Colony had a Being and are incompatible with the Terms on which the People claim both Privilege and protection."¹ A well regulated province, "like a choice Branch springing from the Main Root, ought to be carefully nourished and its just Interests well guarded." If colonies could not be made to contribute profitably to the "Generall Ballance of the whole State" it would be much better for the state to be without them. To the mind of Keith the principles involved were few and simple, their application clear and the result a mercantilist empire as regular in its structure as a blockhouse and as easily understood. The similarity in tone—though the policies advocated were diametrically opposed—between Keith's dogmatic views of society as constructed on the mercantilist plan and the writings of extreme Manchester men, like MacCulloch, a century later in support of free trade, is striking.

¹ Chalmers states that this idea had been expressed by Stephen Godin, a merchant, in a memorial submitted to the board in July, 1716. Godin had specially in mind the levy by the colonies of discriminating duties on British goods. Chalmers, Introd. etc., II, 6.

Coming to the subject of government, Keith drew the natural inference that it should be the faithful servant and protector of the trade system as he had just outlined it. Were the system and the motives underlying it clearly understood, there would be little need of instructions and prohibitions, for all would leap spontaneously to its support. He even considered that it was improper to speak of legislative power in a dependent government. He repeated the worn-out dictum of the Stuart period, one which the Andros régime exemplified, that colonies were to be considered as so many "Corporations at a distance, invested with an ability to make temporary By Laws for themselves agreeable to their respective Situations and Climates, but no ways interfering with the legal Prerogative of the Crown, or the true Legislative Power of the Mother State." In criticising the colonial governments Keith, in accordance with his views and policy as revealed in Pennsylvania, laid great stress on the evils which came from the councils and the obstacles which they frequently put in the way of the exercise of royal, that is autocratic, power through the governors. He thought that they should not have the negative voice and of course scouted any pretension on their part to a place analogous to that of the house of lords in the English constitution. So amateurish were the judges in the colonies and so unqualified were the people, owing to the lack of schools and proper instruction, for jury service that the only security for liberty and property there which Keith could discover lay in the dispatch of judges from England to go on the circuit through the colonies. But the difficulty here lay in the fact that, before this could be done, revenue for the payment of their salaries must be procured in the colonies. As to the colonial militia, Keith rightly considered it of little utility. On the other hand, he questioned how far it would consist with good policy to give the able men of the colonies a really good military training, and concluded that the safest course would be to keep an adequate regular force so distributed through the colonies that it might be used to meet any emergency. By this he did not mean to facilitate colonial union, for he approved of the divided condition of the colonies and of their mutual jealousies, and considered it the part of wisdom to keep them in that condition. Coming to the vital subject of revenue, upon which so much depended, Keith agreed with Cummings in suggesting that the British stamp duties on parchment and paper should be extended to the colonies by act of parliament. And finally, in order to simplify and facilitate colonial administration in England, he urged that all business in that department be centered in the board of trade and that its president be raised to cabinet rank.

With the subject of trade as a feature of colonial policy the privy council had little directly to do. The hearing of appeals and passing on colonial laws were the two chief subjects of its attention. These, together with other less continuous activities, brought a large variety of colonial matters before it, but they did not often relate directly to trade.¹ As to the treasury and the admiralty, they considered questions of colonial policy only so far as they affected the special work of these departments, imperial revenue in the one case and the navy in the other.² Action by the treasury was for the most part confined to sanctioning or rejecting items of expenditure already endorsed by some other official or body of officials. As the customs board and the office of auditor general were subordinate to the treasury, there was frequent communication between them and the board of trade, the navy board, the paymaster general of the forces and the ordnance board about expenditures affecting the colonies. But these formed an insignificant part of the grand total and had little to do with the subject now under discussion. The policy to be followed relating to trade was determined by the king and cabinet and the parliament, all making use of the proofs and arguments furnished by the board of trade and by the merchants and officials on whom it drew for facts and opinion. In the cabinet the voices of the secretaries of state and prime minister may be considered in general most weighty on these subjects. But upon the measures with which we have to do little direct expression of opinion by leading British statesmen is accessible. As these were not government measures, probably little that was definite was expressed by them in public. All statesmen of the time were mercantilists of a more or less decided type. But they were deeply engaged in the game of politics and questions of trade and colonial administration, except in connection with appointments to minor offices, had only a remote interest for them. Even in the case of such a busybody as Newcastle, this fact becomes perfectly clear to a reader of his correspondence. Though in general the king and his cabinet approved of the policy recommended by the board of trade and furthered it, they viewed it from the standpoint of the practical more than the theoretical and favored its execution only in parts and to a limited extent. In their minds mercantilism and projects of colonial autocracy were diluted by mixture with many other plans and were actually applied in much reduced strength. This was especially true so long as Walpole was in power and under his Whig successors until after 1760.¹

¹ The truth of this can be seen by following through the entries in the Acts P. C. Col.

² In the case of the treasury this can be confirmed from the material in the Cals. of Treas. Papers. Matter relating to the admiralty is far less accessible and probably less abundant.

But the cabinets acted in conjunction with parliament. There the condition was somewhat analogous, though of course very different. Several of the more active members of the board of trade held seats in the house of commons and were active there also. One or two peers were always included among the working members of the board. The merchants as a class were also pretty well represented in the commons and, as time passed, their influence increased. In both houses there was, of course, a vigorous and growing interest in the subjects of trade, the navy, the colonies and commercial supremacy. At the time of which we are speaking, this was distinctly shown in the lords as well as in the commons, and it is proven by the frequency with which both houses called upon the board of trade for information and by the many and large committees which were appointed, especially in the lower house, to consider the reports and evidence submitted.¹ For about a decade after its creation it was customary for the house of lords to call annually for a report from the board of trade concerning the condition of commerce and the plantations in general. The African trade in particular and the struggle which was then in progress between the Royal African Company, to retain its monopoly, and the interlopers to gain access to its territory or to change from a joint stock to a regulated form, were subjects of frequent discussion in parliament, and of final action. The same was true respecting the East India Company. Any or all of the "trades" and the companies or groups of merchants that controlled them might at any time become subjects of discussion and action in parliament. So far as the "trades" in Africa, the East Indies and many parts of Europe were concerned, the trading companies corresponded institutionally to the colonies and plantations in America.² In the case of the former only factories or trading posts had been established among alien peoples, while in the case of the latter British colonies with organized governments had been planted and the native inhabitants were in process of subjugation or extermination. But these communities, under whatever form, with their backers in Great Britain, were equally subject to inquiry and control by the executive and parliament of the realm. The fact itself and abundant illustrations of it, so far as the colonies were concerned, and as existing from the first, have already been cited. The English Revolution had forced the recognition beyond cavil of the sovereignty of parliament in the constitution, and the results of it were now being worked out in practice. In theory, however slight the correspondence to it might be in fact, the realm and dominions were being treated as a unit, with the navy and merchant marine and the administrative officials of every variety as the physical and human ligaments which bound it together. So remote and disjointed were the parts that it required and still requires an unusual flight of the imagination to realize this fact, but the sources for the time make the fact indubitably clear.

¹ The orders, warrants, and fragmentary minutes of the secretaries of state and cabinets yield virtually nothing on the subject of trade and the colonies. The correspondence of some of the statesmen is more valuable on these subjects.

¹ Abundant proof of these statements may be found in the Journals of the Lords and Commons.

² See W. R. Scott, The Joint Stock Companies to 1720; also Cunningham, Growth of English Industry and Commerce.

Since the Revolution, moreover, and to an extent before it, imperial control and the formulation of commercial and imperial policy had ceased to be matters alone or chiefly for the British executive. They had now been taken up by political parties and social groups and classes, all of which were more or less fully represented in parliament. The merchant class in particular, which was so enthusiastically described by Defoe, was now rising to control and, after the inventions of the middle of the century, was to broaden into the industrial aristocracy of later times. Questions in which they were specially interested were now coming to furnish more and more of the staple of debate in both houses. In theory at least no subject was exempt from such criticism and action and no section of the earth's surface where British interests were established; and as time passed fact came more and more to correspond with theory. Concerning any or all of these subjects and interests questions were asked, petitions presented, bills introduced, committees appointed for special consideration of subjects and report thereon, debates upon the floor of the houses followed, sometimes in committees of the whole, sometimes in regular session. The consideration of interests, policies or measures was sometimes prolonged at intervals for weeks or months, or perhaps during the entire period were never disposed of or laid wholly to rest. Action under all these forms might be initiated by the government or from the floor, and in all cases prior or concurrent action by the cabinet and its members and by the appropriate administrative boards was required. Final action was taken when statutes were passed. In them were summed up the principles upon which the parliament and executive as a whole had decided for the time to act. Until changed, they were law.

We have seen that the board of trade was a clearing house for opinions and policies respecting trade and colonial government. It was deliberating and acting continuously. The privy council gave to the deliberations of the board on many subjects the necessary executive authority. The treasury and admiralty, in their spheres, acted in more direct connection with the cabinet. The parliament, on the other hand, was by on means continuously in session. But, notwithstanding that, it was the supreme clearing house for all imperial, as well as domestic, questions and to its deliberations and actions the entire British executive was and is contributory. Parliament is the centre of the organism, the ultimate depository of authority. The due recognition of this is necessary to any proper discussion of imperial control over the colonies, over trade and war, and ultimately over international relations in general. Allowance must, of course, be made for large initiative and discretion on the part of the executive in all these activities of government, but ultimately, though possibly after years of delay, as the result of the financial check or the political check exercised through elections, it must submit to the judgment of the nation expressed through parliament. This was a principle of the Whig party, held as time went on with the firmness of a dogma. It is also a commonplace of English history. Therefore, if the treatment of imperial control over the colonies during the period now under review is to be adequate, this fact must be fully recognized. The inquiry will by no means terminate with the board of trade and privy council, but will extend to the abundant material, and proofs and indications of action, to be found in the journals of the two houses. Like the study of the journals of the colonial assemblies, the examinations of the contents of these journals is of prime importance. The close connection which existed between the board of trade and the parliament is made perfectly evident, both through the information furnished to the houses by the board and by the fact that certain of its members were active workers in them. Except in the lines of legal and judicial control, the only way in which the board could make its views effective was through procuring their acceptance by the cabinet and parliament.

The character of the cabinet and its probable influence as a refracting medium upon cut and dried theories of trade and colonial government — or in fact upon any other theories — have already been indicated. The two houses offered another medium, which might even be called refractory, through which many an attractive plan failed wholly to pass or was so modified in its passage as to be scarcely recognizable by its originators. The merchants, all more or less zealous and imbued with mercantilist theories, were influential, especially in the house of commons. Members of the board of trade were there, often serving on committees and reporting bills. Their representations, together with much additional evidence, were presented to the houses. There were probably no members of either house who were not mercantilists, either consciously or half consciously, and they responded favorably to the appeals of that intensified form of nationalism which the empire, the navy and trade supremacy evoked. But only under the pressure of great crises or of thoroughly convinced and impassioned leadership can legislative bodies be brought to act decisively or with unanimity. Under Walpole and his immediate successors the kind of leadership and the crises referred to were lacking. The landed interests, moreover, were still strong especially in the lords, and it did not easily respond to the appeals of the merchants. For these and many other reasons, which this is not the place even to attempt to analyze, the two houses lagged considerably behind the board of trade and its favorite advisers in the thoroughness with which they were prepared to apply schemes which looked toward more rigid imperial control. The legal authority and the power were there in reserve, but only limited provision was made for their exercise and that along traditional lines. In this diluting effect which the cabinet and parliament exercised upon the plans of the board of trade and its so-called experts lay the only real guaranty of colonial liberty. No other was possible under the British system as it then was. It remained operative, as a certain tacit understanding, until after the middle of the century.

In earlier chapters the legislation affecting the colonies, which was passed by parliament before the close of the reign of Anne, has been discussed. The questions which came up, or which reached a decision, during the first fifteen years of Hanoverian rule did not involve any new ideas or policies. For some time the house of commons was more or less occupied with the adjustment of the accounts of expenditures during the last years of the war, and among these the accounts of Hovenden Walker's expedition occupied a rather prominent place. In connection with this Hunter's claims and the fortunes of the Palatines in New York received some attention from a committee of the house. The bill for the recall of the colonial charters, which was a favorite with the board of trade, then failed of passage. Among the yearly estimates for the army appeared always the small sums desired for the payment of the few companies of regulars which were stationed in Nova Scotia, New York and elsewhere, and for ordnance stores intended for the colonies. Piracy and the unsettled conditions in South Carolina were repeatedly noticed and the way was thus prepared for the law of 1729 abolishing the Carolina proprietorship. Early in 1717 a bill continuing the liberty to import Irish linen free of duty to the plantations became law,¹ though petitions against it came from the linen drapers of London and Manchester. The privilege was to be continued as long as British merchants might export to Ireland linen of British manufacture free. In 1718 and 1719 the subject of naval stores was discussed and a clause was added to an act against the clandestine running of uncustomed goods which provided, on account of complaints made by the navy of the poor quality of pitch and tar recently imported from America, that no certificate should be granted for a premium until it was proven that the product was clean, good and merchantable.² In 1722 the second important statute, continuing the policy of Anne's reign concerning naval stores, was passed.³ During the discussion at this time the subject of iron received some attention, petitions and arguments being presented by British officials, merchants and manufacturers on both sides of the question, some advocating the liberal importation of pig iron from America in order to economize the forests of England and to make Great Britain more independent of the Baltic countries, and others prophesying the ruin of the British iron industry if such a policy should be followed. As this was the first time when iron was prominently discussed, naturally no action was taken. Piracy and the transportation of felons to the plantations were also considered, the latter subject repeatedly and ¹ 3 Geo. I, c. 21, continuing 3 & 4 Anne, c. 8.

² 5 Geo. I, c. 11.

³ 8 Geo. I, c. 12. The king's speech at the opening of parliament in October, 1721, dwelt upon the importance of encouraging the production of naval stores in the colonies. So the government as a whole was committed to it.

at length, and respecting it two important statutes were passed.¹ Several later acts providing for the transportation of felons were passed at intervals toward 1750.²

In 1721 beaver skins and other furs and copper ore from the plantations were added to the list of enumerated commodities.³ In 1722 Micajah Perry and others who were importers of tobacco from Virginia complained loudly of the extent to which the Scotch were out — competing them in this trade and were selling tobacco in Holland more cheaply than they could do. It was also declared that extensive frauds in the customs were being committed in Scotland. The subject attracted much attention in the commons, but instead of a separate bill being passed for preventing frauds in the tobacco trade, this was merged in an act enabling the king to put the customs administration of Great Britain under one commission.⁴ Early in 1729, as the result of a general effort made by the Virginians and the merchants who were interested in their trade — Perry, who was a member of the commons, again leading — the clause in an earlier act prohibiting the importation of tobacco stripped from the stalk was repealed. This was done out of consideration of the importance of the tobacco industry, and it was claimed that, by allowing the importation of the lower and shattered leaves, the total marketed product would be increased by a fifth.⁵ At about the same time, for the encouragement of the fishery and at the instance of Perry and other merchants, acts were passed allowing the importation of salt direct from the continent of Europe into Pennsylvania and New York.⁶ In 1729 the act for the further preservation of the woods, about which there was so much contention in New England, was passed.⁷

Rice, which since the close of the previous century had become one of the staple products of South Carolina, along ¹ 4 Geo. I, c. 11 (1717), and 6 Geo. I, c. 23 (1719).

² 12 Geo. I, c. 29 (1725); 7 Geo. II, c. 21 (1734); 12 Geo. II, c. 21 (1739); 16 Geo. II, c. 15 & 31 (1743); 20 Geo. II, c. 46 (1747).

³ By 8 Geo. I, c. 15, and 8 Geo. I, c. 18.

⁴ 9 Geo. I, c. 21.

⁵ Commons Journal, XXI, 261 et seq.; 2 Geo. II, c. 9.

⁶ 13 Geo. I, c. 5, and 3 Geo. II, c. 12. In the first of these acts doubt was expressed whether the term "New England," used in 15 Chas. II, extended to Pennsylvania. Commons Jo. XX, 746 et seq.; XXI, 461, 485, 531.

⁷ 2 Geo. II, c. 22.

with molasses had been placed in the list of enumerated commodities in the reign of Anne.¹ The yield of rice increased rapidly, so that before its enumeration the American product, considered the best in the world, had come to monopolize the Portuguese market and was making headway in Spain. Large quantities also were sold in northern Europe. A suggestion that its direct exportation to the south of Europe was injurious to England easily secured its addition to the enumerated list. But the roundabout voyage by the way of England so increased the cost of freight that the Portuguese market was lost. The result was that while on the average during the years 1712 to 1717, of the 2,800,000 lbs. which were imported from Carolina and the other plantations, more than 2,000,000 lbs. were sold in northern Europe and less than 250,000 lbs. to the countries south of Cape Finisterre. In 1720 Boone,² the agent of South Carolina, dwelt on the loss of this trade, and the board of trade in its report of 1721 fully stated the fact and its cause. The board recommended as a remedy that permission for the export of rice direct from South Carolina to parts of Europe south of Cape Finisterre be granted, but that security be required that every vessel which took advantage of this should touch in England on its return voyage. But no action was taken and the South Carolinians continued their arguments and complaints for a decade longer.³ It was a demand for a larger market, as the capacity of South Carolina to produce rice largely exceeded the demand from northern Europe alone. Finally, in 1730, liberty was granted to carry this product to any part of Europe south of Cape Finisterre in ships legally built and owned. Five years later the same concession was made in favor of rice from Georgia.⁴ This was not done by taking rice off the list of enumerated commodities, but by legalizing the system of special licenses with security which had been suggested by the board of trade. The provision was continued by later acts and the Portuguese market was promptly

¹ 3 & 4 Anne, c. 5 sect. 12; N. Y. Col. Docs., V, 612.

² B. T. S. Car. O. P.

³ See Francis Yonge's "View of the Trade of South Carolina," presented to the board in 1723. B. T. S. C. O. P., and many other references.

⁴ 3 Geo. II, c. 28; 8 Geo. II, c. 19; Commons J. XX, 62, 443, 500, 535 587, 813; Lords J. XXIII, 566-576.

recovered, the price of rice ranging high during the later colonial period.

About 1730 the manufacture of hats reached such proportions in a few of the colonies as to attract the attention of the organized leaders of that trade in England. Beaver obtained in trade with the Indians and afterwards wool were used in this industry. New York, Massachusetts and South Carolina were the colonies where the making of hats chiefly developed. At first the term feltmakers was used to designate those who followed this trade, and they begin to appear about 1700 on the lists of burghers in New York City. During the next thirty years it is thought that the industry progressed so as largely to supply the demand for the common quality of hats and caps throughout the colonies. Some also were exported to the West Indies. Thomas Coram was one of the most careful observers of such developments, and early in 1732 he supported the petition of the hatters before the board of trade.¹ Under an order from the commons, the board at that time was investigating the laws made and the manufactures set up in the colonies which might affect the interests of Great Britain. Coram was an ultra mercantilist and, in a long memorial which he now presented on the general subject of colonial manufactures, he portrayed the situation in strong colors and recommended a strenuous policy. Wool, hats and shoes came in for special mention, and his conclusion was that manufactures in these lines should be restrained or totally prohibited while they were in their infancy, lest they should grow to such strength that it would be dangerous or even impossible to suppress them. The hatters at the same time petitioned that the colonists might be prevented from wearing or selling any hats except those which were made in Great Britain. The immediate result, so far as the industry of hat making was concerned, was the passage of the act, 5 Geo II, c. 22, which applied to that industry the kind of treatment which had been prescribed for woollens in 1699. Intercolonial trade in hats and felts was prohibited under heavy penalties, and in addition hat making in the colonies was restricted to those who had served an apprenticeship of seven years and the masters were prohibited from keeping more than two apprentices each. No negroes were to be employed in hat making. The effect of this law upon the industry was not appreciably different from that of the legislation of 1699 on the manufactures of wool. Hat making was not suppressed, and since no provision was made in either the law of 1699 or that of 1732 for special officials of royal appointment for their execution, we hear little or nothing of special measures for restricting the manufacture of hats.

¹ B. T. Journal, N. J. Arch. V, 308.

It therefore appears, from this review, that up to about 1730, though the cabinet and parliament were much occupied with questions of trade, no new principles were evolved, though the application of those already accepted was slightly extended. Of special importance is the fact that no wholesale changes in the administrative or fiscal policy of Great Britain toward the colonies were considered or probably even mentioned in those bodies which were really responsible for the conduct of the British government.

CHAPTER II

THE OVERTHROW OF PROPRIETARY GOVERNMENT IN SOUTH CAROLINIA

IN none of the proprietary provinces did government sink to a lower point of efficiency than it did in the Carolinas. In the northern part of the original province it never had more than a nominal existence. In South Carolina, while for a number of decades their administration was reasonably vigorous, before the beginning of the eighteenth century the activity of the proprietors began to relax.¹ At the same time the ecclesiastical policy to which they gave their support was so reactionary as deeply to offend not only the dissenters but many of the Anglicans in the province. During the second intercolonial war also the Spanish in Florida and the French from the west were a menace to this region, and the proprietors were too weak to afford the inhabitants appreciable aid or protection. Fortunately the enemy made no serious attack, but during this war and for years thereafter the danger of leaving a frontier province under such weak control was repeatedly brought home both to its people and to the British government. The proprietors themselves openly confessed their inability to provide for its defence, and yet the peril was not so great nor the plea of military necessity so strong as to lead the government to take over the province and provide directly for its defence.

In 1715, just after the close of the war, a formidable Indian conspiracy was formed against the whites. At the head of this were the Yemassee who not very long before had removed from Spanish territory and settled near Port Royal. They were the most powerful tribe who lived in the immediate vicinity of the white settlements. Apalachis, and others joined in their conspiracy till it was widely extended to the northward and westward. The usual causes impelled them to it, namely, encroachment on the lands of the Indians and ill usage on the part of traders. The plan of the natives was to exterminate the settlers, and they did inflict terrible slaughter and destruction of property, extending their ravages to within twenty miles of Charlestown, St. Bartholomew and near Port Royal.¹ The parish of St. James, Goose Creek, the residence of the Moore family, was later attacked. When the report first reached Charlestown that war was to be expected, Nairn, the Indian agent, was sent to allay, if possible, the dissatisfaction of the Indians; but he and those who accompanied him were massacred, and with that the carnage began.

¹ For the cause of this, see Osgood, Am. Colonies in the 17th Century, II, 201, 202.

South Carolina could then muster not more than 1200 men fit for service, against a force of Indian allies roughly estimated at 8000. Governor Craven acted with energy and some success. The assembly supported his action with such laws and orders as were possible. But the supply of arms and ammunition was very inadequate and aid from outside seemed absolutely necessary if the colony was to be saved from destruction. With £2500 appropriated by the assembly a messenger was sent to New England to purchase arms. Arthur Middleton was also sent to Virginia to seek its aid. North Carolina, which had recently been helped by its southern neighbor, sent a small body of volunteers, placing no condition on its offer. Without delay Governor Spotswood sent by the royal guardship 160 muskets and some powder and ball from the magazine at Williamsburg. Somewhat later 118 men were sent and preparations were made to send enough men to increase the total to three hundred. Spotswood had some personal interest in this, for he feared that the Indian war might spread to the Virginia frontier. If Carolina were destroyed, there was also danger that the French would seize it and stir up a war along the entire frontier. But in giving the aid Spotswood showed the superciliousness of the royal governor by remarking that, even though the Carolinians lived under proprietors, they were subjects of the king in common with the inhabitants of Virginia. Unusual terms also were imposed, for Virginia insisted that an able-bodied slave be sent to take the place of every man whom she contributed and that the slaves remain throughout the war. This condition it was found impossible to enforce. The Virginia militia were also poorly armed and thought by the Carolinians to be inefficient. Spotswood was at last forced to accept £4 per month in South Carolina currency as the pay of every man sent and no clothing or slaves. Many of the Virginia soldiers were also said to have been induced or forced to remain permanently in South Carolina, and a long controversy followed between the officials of the two colonies over this affair, echoes of which were heard by the imperial authorities in London.¹ To such extent was this interesting experiment in joint colonial action marred by the usual recriminations. Hunter of New York expressed his interest by trying to induce the Senecas to attack the Yemasseees.

¹ McCrady, South Carolina under Proprietary Government, 531-548 and references; N. C. Col. Recs., II, 177 et seq.; Letters from missionaries in MS. Recs. of S. P. G., 1715 and 1716.

The war lasted for nearly a year and many months passed after that before outrages ceased on the frontier. The people of two parishes were either slaughtered or driven in a body from their houses, and great damage was inflicted upon the colony. But under the efficient leadership of Governor Craven, slaves being enrolled to serve with their masters, the inhabitants at last succeeded in destroying their enemy and driving the remnant of them across the border into Florida. Had the Yemasseees received aid from the more important tribes of the interior, the chances are that the whites would have been entirely overwhelmed. As it was, the Spanish, though it was a time of peace, were charged with sheltering Yemasseees at St. Augustine, furnishing them arms and ammunition and receiving slaves which they brought across the border from South Carolina. It was also said that Spanish privateers were unusually numerous off the coast and were preying on British commerce. These charges were laid by the board of trade before Secretary Methuen,² and they were closely connected with that course of Spanish policy which soon led to the renewal of open hostilities.

¹ Colls. of Virginia Hist. Soc., Spotswood Letters, II, iii, 114, 117, 119, 121, 126-129, 131, 141, 144, 164, 207, 238, 242; Va. Ex. C. J., C. O. 5/1416, 1715 and 1716; N. C. Col. Recs., II, 203, 225, 227, 234, 253, 254. Virginia sent, in all, about 150 men to South Carolina, and North Carolina sent about fifty. J. of Va. Burgesses, Session of Aug. and Sept., 1715.

² C. O. 5/382, B. T. to Methuen, Dec. 17, 1716; B. T. to Sec. Craggs, Nov. 17, 1720.

When the Indian war was at its height appeals were sent to the proprietors for aid and Governor Craven wrote directly to Lord Townshend, one of the secretaries of state.¹ In an urgent address to the king the commons house asked to be taken directly under royal care and government, as the only course which offered assurance of safety. They hoped the king would command Virginia and the other colonies to aid them. Joseph Boone and Landgrave Kettleby, one the agent of the governor and council and the other of the assembly, backed by a number of merchants, offered a ship to carry what could be at once despatched and called earnestly for troops in addition. The fact that South Carolina was a border province and also a great producer of rice, naval stores and skins added greatly to the force of these appeals. The proprietors, of course, confessed their inability to do more than to contribute their receipts from a small quantity of rice received and to order their receiver in South Carolina to expend what he had in hand for arms and ammunition, and to promise a repayment of these debts thereafter. The board of trade urged them to surrender the government of the province to the crown, but an agreement as to terms could not be reached. Chiefly through Lord Carteret as their mouth-piece they plead the large expenditures of the proprietors in settling the province and its great value to the empire. Therefore it advised the king, in view of the importance of South Carolina as a border province, to assume direct control.² The case also came before the house of commons and was inquired into by one of its committees. But as the Hanoverian family had recently come to the throne and was just then threatened by the Jacobite uprising of 1715, the crown found obstacles in the way of its action almost as great as those which were faced by the proprietors. The result was that no troops were sent, but instead only a supply of arms to continue their hold upon the government of the province.

Meantime the colonists themselves repelled the enemy and the crisis was passed, a good example in miniature of the way in which events of this nature usually turned out in the continental colonies. By the defeat of the Indians a considerable territory between the Cambahee and Savannah rivers was opened for settlement and the hold of the natives upon the region which was to become Georgia was weakened. The injuries which for years to come they were to continue to inflict came in the form of raids from beyond the Spanish border. This struggle cost South Carolina about £150,000 and some provision had to be made for bearing this burden of debt and restoring prosperity. To this task the assembly addressed itself in the spring of 1716. Governor Craven had then returned to England and Robert Daniel was acting as deputy governor, while the proprietors were preparing to appoint Robert Johnson, son of Sir Nathaniel Johnson, as governor to succeed Craven. He arrived and assumed office in the autumn of the following year. The feeling of hostility in the commons house toward the proprietors was strong. It immediately instructed its agents in England to urge upon the crown the necessity of taking over the government of the province if it was to be protected against its enemies.¹ In obedience to this the agents sent a strongly worded memorial to the board of trade. In this they set forth again the delinquencies of the proprietors and the dangers to which the colony was exposed not only from the Indians but from the French and Spanish. They assumed that the French had stirred up the Indians to the recent attacks, and expected still more disastrous experiences when there should be another rupture with France. The advantage of fortifying the excellent harbor of Port Royal, together with a corresponding post on the Bahama islands, as a means of controlling the Florida Passage did not escape their attention. They also enlarged on the great value to England of the staple products of South Carolina and on the heavy debt which it must now bear as arguments in support of their demand for protection. The board of trade was of course sympathetic with these desires, but the ministers were not yet ready to act.

¹ Ibid., August and later, 1715.

² C. O. 5/383, B. T. to Secy. Stanhope, July 19, 1715; N. C. Col. Recs., II, 177, 191-199, 230; McCrady, op. cit. 538 et seq.

The assembly at Charlestown meantime passed some very important laws. The expulsion of the Yemassee led the proprietors at once to withdraw the prohibition on the settlement of the lands between the Cambahee and Savannah rivers, which nearly two years before had been reserved for the exclusive use of the Indians with the idea that they would form a buffer tribe between the whites and the hostile Indians to the south which were under Spanish influence. The assembly repealed the act of 1707 under which that prohibition had been enforced and Protestant colonists from Great Britain, Ireland and the other dominions invited on specified terms as to size of grants, quit rents and time of settlement. Impressed with the rapid increase in the number of negroes as compared with white servants in the colony, the receiver was ordered to pay a bounty for every white servant imported, provided they were not Roman Catholics, native Irish or persons of known scandalous character. The narrowly Protestant and Anglo-Scotch spirit of the colonists at that time is thus clearly indicated.¹ In another act an effort was made directly to check the importation of negroes by imposing a duty of £3 currency per head upon those brought in from Africa and £30 per head on those imported from other colonies. This measure was opposed to the desire of the home government that no obstacle should be put in the way of the traffic of the Royal African Company. Authority was given for additional emissions of currency to the amount of £45,000. A law for the regulating of Indian trade was also passed.²

¹ N. C. Recs., II, 224, 229 et seq.; McCrady, op. cit.

By another very important act the assembly sought to decentralize elections in the province. Hitherto, in spite of one or two experiments to the contrary, they had been held exclusively in Charlestown, where tumults often occurred and undue political influence was always exerted. It had been the policy of the proprietors to support this arrangement and it was a feature of the general tendency to concentrate government in the hands of a few, for which they showed decided sympathy. The act which was now passed provided that elections should be held in all the parishes under the charge of the church wardens, and made a new proportional distribution of members among the parishes. Some changes were also made in the property qualifications of voters and members and provision was made for voting by ballot. In this way it was planned to assimilate the electoral system of South Carolina to that of other provinces and to weaken the control over it of proprietary officials at Charlestown.¹ By an act of the following year the anti-proprietary spirit of the assembly was further shown by a provision excluding from seats in that body all who held offices or perquisites from the proprietors. Electors were also required to have been residents for six months in the parish where they voted and representatives were required to be free-born subjects of Great Britain or naturalized by act of parliament. Boone and Beresford were at the same time laying another address from the assembly before the king asking him to take over the province and charging the proprietors with continued inactivity except in support of a faction of office holders and dependents. In reply to this Lord Carteret, before the board of trade, declared that, as the assembly had been dissolved, the agents had no standing and cast doubts upon the earlier representations concerning the seriousness of the Indian War and the peril of the colony.²

¹ See Osgood, Am. Colonies in 17th Century, II, 419.

² Statutes of S. C. II, 641, 647, 649, 662, 682, 683; McCrady, op. cit. 555 et seq.; Yonge, in Carroll, Hist. Colls. of S. C., II, 149.

When Governor Robert Johnson arrived in South Carolina it was entering upon its dramatic struggle with the pirates under Stede Bonnet and his associates, the last important conflict which was to occur with that gentry on the North American coast. Under the lead of William Rhett, as we have seen, the pirates were conquered, and through the firmness of Nicholas Trott, the chief justice, they were tried, condemned and executed. But this affair cost rather heavily and added to the already burdensome debt of the province. It was also an exciting episode and one in which the settlers had again shown their prowess. In view of the commercial interests which were at stake it was an important service to Great Britain and to all merchants who traded in those waters, and the victory must have appreciably increased the self-confidence of the colonists. Governor Johnson, acting very likely under the advice of Lord Carteret, was more outspoken in support of the proprietors than had been any of his predecessors since the days of his father. In his first speech to the assembly he reproved them sharply for their disrespectful behavior in sending remonstrances to the crown without previously consulting the proprietors or seeking their mediation. The lord palatine could personally have better acted on their behalf. In proof of the good will of the proprietors toward the colonists he called attention to "their donation to the public of all the arrears that are due to them, whether from lands sold or for rent, and all growing rents that shall come due to the first of May 1718, the charges of the civil government only deducted." This was a fair proposition on their part and was about the only contribution which it was in their power to make toward relieving the burdens of the colonists. But on the other hand the paper currency in which their rents and dues must hereafter be paid had greatly depreciated, and to protect themselves as creditors they required that the former selling price of £3 per hundred acres for their land should henceforth be increased to £12 to allow for the depreciation in the paper medium in which payments must thereafter be made. The governor also desired that a rent roll should be prepared. Toward these proposals the assembly, without going seriously into their merits, expressed its impatient opposition, rejecting with contempt the idea that the substitution of £12 for £3 constituted a donation.

¹ S. C. Statutes, III, 3.

² N. C. Col. Recs., II, 280; Rivers, Hist. Sketches of S. C., 464.

The governor and the assembly also had a sharp encounter over the appointment of the powder receiver. Under earlier acts the appointment of this official, like that of the receiver general and controller of duties, had been taken over by the assembly¹; but Johnson now attempted to recover this for the proprietors. Appointments to the office were made by both himself and the assembly, and Johnson ordered that the keys of the magazine should be kept by his appointee, as he was the head of the military and granted commissions. The house refused to proceed with business if this order was executed, but their threats to appeal to the public only induced the governor to consent that both appointments should stand, his appointee keeping the magazine and giving receipts to the other for all the powder which was delivered into his keeping. To this the assembly refused to agree, and immediately posted a public notice commanding all who were liable to the payment of powder duty to discharge their obligation to Colonel Michael Brewton, who, in accordance with an act of 1707, had been appointed powder receiver by the house, and to no one else.¹ To this for the time being the governor had to yield.

¹ Osgood, op cit. II, 230.

These pointed differences, however, did not wholly prevent legislation; but among the laws passed was a revenue act, certain clauses of which were bound to be rejected by the home government. By these it was provided that negroes and all liquors, goods and merchandise which were imported in any vessel which belonged to the inhabitants of the province should come in free, and that those which were imported in vessels built in South Carolina but whose owners lived outside should be liable to only half-duties, and that goods imported in vessels built out of the province but owned by inhabitants of it should be liable to three-quarters duties. These provisions all contained discrimination against British trade and British-owned vessels, which brought from the privy council an order to the proprietors to repeal the act. This they did, but in addition the proprietors repealed the act of 1707 which declared the right of the commons house to name the public receiver, powder receiver and other officials to whom salaries were granted out of the public treasury. The recent election law and the act opening the Yemassee lands for settlement they also repealed; and the Indian trade act of the previous session, the latter on the ground that it granted a monopoly of that trade to a company, it being alleged that a Virginia act had recently been disallowed by the crown because it contained a similar offensive provision.² The order for the repeal of these acts was dated in July, 1718. In the following March the assembly met again, this time under the inspiring influence of the victory over the pirates. Appropriations were made for paying the cost of the expeditions against the pirates and the other debts of the province, for reducing a part of the currency and for the support of the government.³ Evidence that good feeling between the assembly and the governor was apparently restored was also afforded by the passage of an act empowering the receiver general of the proprietors or his deputies to go into every parish and there procure a sworn statement from all landholders of the amount of land they had received, the conditions under which they held it and the time when they last paid their quit rent. Provision was also made for the collection of arrears of rent in money or merchandise and for the use of such surplus as should remain after payment of the salaries which were due from the proprietors toward the building of a state house and prison. In the preamble to this act the resolve of the assembly was expressed to see that justice was done the proprietors in the matter of their land and rents. This law was passed just before the arrival of the order from the proprietors for the repeal of the measures above referred to. It was accompanied by an order to the governor to dissolve the assembly and hold the election of a new one in accordance with the regulations of the earlier statutes.¹

¹ Rivers, Sketches, etc. 282, 283; McCrady, op. cit. 582.

² S. C. Statutes III, 30; Colls. of S. C. Hist. Soc. II, 233, 235.

³ S. C. Stats. III, 56-84.

This action on the part of the proprietors had been encouraged by Chief Justice Trott and his brother-in-law, the receiver general. For some time now these two men had run the affairs of the province, constituting with their friends one of the narrowest and most oppressive official cliques which ever existed in any American colony. Trott was a lawyer and official of great shrewdness and experience resulting from a long career in the Bahamas and South Carolina. Though he at first figured among the planter opposition in South Carolina, after the arrival of Sir Nathaniel Johnson as governor, Trott cast in his lot with the Tories and high churchmen. He cooperated in the reactionary measures of the reign of Anne and in conjunction with Lord Carteret maintained that attitude to the last. He was a firm believer in witchcraft and was probably the last American judge to enforce such belief in a charge from the bench. He did a valuable service by revising and ultimately publishing the laws of South Carolina, but in general he was a thoroughly self-seeking and unprincipled man, one of the large class in the colonies who did not scruple to use high office, even in the judiciary, to further his personal and political ambitions. Having risen from the office of attorney general to that of chief justice, Trott during a visit to England in 1713 and 1714 gained such an ascendancy over the proprietors that they made him a member of the council with the special power that without his presence there could be no quorum of that body. At the same time he received several other special rewards and dignities, and thenceforward carried on a regular correspondence with Shelton, the secretary of the board of proprietors. Though at a later time the proprietors withdrew from Trott the veto power which they had given him in the council, he retained his seat there, being by virtue of that a member of the court of chancery and was in addition made judge of admiralty. By this accumulation of offices Trott monopolized the administration of justice in the province and there was no way of escape from his rulings.

¹ Another act of the proprietors, of more importance at this time, but one which found a place among the complaints, was the increase of the members of the council from eight to ten. This was the result of the abandonment of the old system of filling the council by deputies of the proprietors and of a desire to conform to the practice in other colonies. N. C. Col. Recs. II, 307. Carroll, Hist. Colls. II, 158, 169.

Rhett was a man of the military and purely official type. As receiver general, active member of the assembly and at times its speaker, and as commander of the forces of the province against the pirates, he also exercised great influence. Whenever an election was held this was especially evident, he and the chief justice marshalling the voters who came to the polls at Charlestown and returning a large proportion, if not a majority, of the members. They protested by letters to England against the laws which were passed in 1716 and helped to secure their repeal.¹ For years these two men dominated the politics of South Carolina and often threw the governors into the shade. As Shelton, with whom they regularly corresponded, did most of the business of the proprietors and his sole decision often stood for an act of that board, the circuit was effectively completed and proprietary government in that province was reduced to its simplest terms. It was against this machine and its narrow and arbitrary policy that the colonists now revolted and handed South Carolina over to the crown.

Just before the arrival of orders for the repeal of the acts of the previous year, thirty-one articles of complaint against Trott had been submitted to the assembly.² They charged him with partiality on the bench, with acting as counsel in cases which were pending before him as judge, with taking exorbitant fees, unduly prolonging causes and monopolizing the administration of justice. As Trott refused to recognize the right of the assembly to take action in this matter, it asked the governor and council to join them in a representation to the proprietors that they would remove him from his judicial offices. To this Johnson and a majority of the council agreed. But before the appeal was sent news came of the disallowance of the acts and the order for a new election. The assembly, as was done in other proprietary provinces, now denied the right of the proprietors to veto acts which had been approved by both houses and the governor. At a conference between the houses, Trott in a speech defended the right which the proprietors had just exercised. Their action was, however, ignored by the governor and assembly to the extent that a new election was not ordered, and Francis Yonge, a member of the council, was sent to England as agent to explain the situation fully to the proprietors.

¹ Colls of S. C. Hist. Soc. II, 255.

² Yonge in Carroll, II, 151 et seq.; Hewatt in Carroll, I, 214 et seq.

This errand Yonge performed in London in the late spring and summer of 1719, though during the absence of Lord Carteret, who was then on an embassy to Sweden.¹ After long delay he obtained a conference with a part of the proprietary board, but was unable to induce them to depart in any way from their traditional attitude. They approved of Trott and insisted upon their rights in every point. They criticised Yonge, who was a deputy of one of the proprietors, for undertaking the agency. They reproved the governor for not literally obeying their instruction to dissolve the assembly and hold a new election, though by so doing a considerable amount of revenue would have been sacrificed and a revolt threatened. The repeal of the acts they ordered him at once to publish. They also sent over a commission for a new council of twelve members,² from whom Skene, Broughton and Kinloch, former members of the council who had sided with the opposition, were dropped. Trott was among the councillors continued in office and the board was filled with men who were understood to be supporters of the proprietors. Orders were also issued that no more land should be granted, but that fifteen baronies should be laid out as near as possible to Port Royal for the use of the proprietors,¹ thus effectually shutting out several hundred immigrants from the north of Ireland who had come to settle on the Yemassee lands. These orders, when they reached Charlestown, Governor Johnson considered that he had no alternative but to obey. The new councillors were sworn in and, sharing the responsibility with them as advisers, he proclaimed the repeal of the acts, dissolved the assembly and ordered a new election to be held at Charlestown. The issue was now squarely drawn.

¹ Yonge in Carroll, II, 153 et seq.; McCrady, 635 et seq.

² The council had previously consisted of eight members, all originally being deputies of the proprietors.

As the formation of the Quadruple Alliance by Cardinal Alberoni for the purpose of overthrowing the treaty of Utrecht had again brought Great Britain into hostile relations with Spain, an expedition against South Carolina was reported to be preparing at Havana. Some months previously the governor had written to the board of trade on the need of a station ship at Charlestown² and arrangements had been made for sending one but it had not been actually despatched. On learning of the danger, Johnson called a conference of such of the council and newly elected members of the assembly as could be gotten together and proposed a voluntary subscription for the repair of the fortifications. But falling into a dispute with Trott over the question whether or not revenue could be collected under one of the acts which had been repealed, but the repeal of which had not been recognized by the assembly, the conference broke up.

Johnson now turned to the military and commanded the field officers to review their regiments and order a rendezvous against the approach of the Spaniards. This afforded the opportunity which was desired. Articles of association were prepared which were signed by the militia almost to a man,³ Alexander Skene, who had been excluded from the council and who had been secretary of Barbadoes, acting as leader in this movement. It took the form of a resolve to throw off entirely the authority of the proprietors and declare South Carolina a royal province, November 28, 1719. As Johnson had not incurred special dislike, he was asked to continue in office, but to "hold the Reins of Government for the King till his Majesty's Pleasure be known." Johnson received this message at his plantation and came at once to town and consulted the council. It was decided to postpone action until the new assembly should meet.

¹ Yonge in Carroll, II, 159.

² S. C. Hist. Colls, II, 258.

³ Yonge in Carroll, II, 164

Meantime the leaders of the uprising obtained signatures to their association from nearly all the people of the province. When the session opened, December 10, the governor proceeded as usual with his part in the organization, but through the lips of Arthur Middleton, who had been returned as elected, the assembly informed Johnson that they owned him as governor because he had been approved by the king, but the new council, because of its large membership, they did not recognize as legal and would not act with it. They had also resolved that the acts which had been repealed were still in force and therefore that the recent election was void and they no assembly. The proprietors, they continued, by such proceedings had unhinged the frame of government and forfeited their right to it. They therefore as a convention delegated by the people, to prevent the ruin and loss of the province, offered the governorship to Johnson until the crown could be consulted. After receiving from the council notice that, in view of the general defection, mild measures ending in a possible dissolution were the only ones possible, Johnson made to the assembly or convention a long speech.¹ In this he required an explicit statement from them, whether they renounced the authority of the proprietors in toto or only that of the council as at present organized. If they chose the former alternative, he warned them of the seriousness of overthrowing a charter by other than regular judicial process and the danger to their land titles which might be involved therein. In their reply they adhered to the former alternative, but with language so mild and with such expressions of confidence in him that Johnson thought it possible to solve the difficulty by a dissolution. But when he tried that his proclamation was torn from the marshal's hands and the insurgents organized themselves as a convention and ordered all officials to obey them. On December 21, in the presence of the militia drawn up in the market place, Colonel James Moore was proclaimed governor in the name of the king. Johnson on that day exerted himself to the utmost to prevent this being done, but he found no support and was obliged to retire to his plantation and allow the revolt to take its course. A council of twelve, after the royal model, was organized and Sir Hovenden Walker, now a Carolinian, was made president.

¹ Yonge in Carroll, II, 170 et seq.

The next move of the convention was to vote itself an assembly and as such to appoint a secretary, provost marshal and other officers. Trott was removed and a new chief justice appointed. Under an order exempting those officers who had to do with the property and revenue of the proprietors Rhett escaped removal. A declaration of what they had done and the reasons therefor was published and Colonel John Barnwell was sent as agent to England to lay their case before the crown and ask to be taken under its protection.¹ Johnson also sent to the proprietors and the board of trade a careful account of his own course of action and of the reasons why he felt bound to stand by the proprietary cause. As he had not been guilty of maladministration he hoped that the king, if he took control of the province, would continue him in his office. Trott, who was now leaving for England, proposed that if Johnson would contribute to his expenses he would give the proprietors so favorable an account of his conduct that they would continue him in his office. But this offer was curtly declined and Trott from that time was Johnson's enemy. Rhett also accepted from the revolutionary government the office of overseer of repairs and fortifications in Charlestown. He was also receiver general for the proprietors and comptroller of the king's customs. In this latter capacity he rejected the proposal of Johnson to refuse clearance to all vessels until they paid duty to him as public receiver, thus keeping fees out of the hands of the officials of the Convention. By this act Rhett also veered away from the former governor and trimmed his sails for continuance in office under the crown. Under Rhett's superintendence the work of repairing the fortifications at Charlestown was very carelessly done, though at heavy cost. But fortunately the expedition of the Spaniards ended disastrously at the Bahamas and did not reach the Carolina coast. After it failed the Flamborough, man-of-war, took up its station at Charlestown and the Phoenix halted in the harbor after a cruise. As the commanders of both these vessels declared in favor of Johnson's claims to be the legal governor, he tried once more to regain his authority by a threat to bombard the town. But the people remained unmoved and the threat was never carried into execution.

¹ McCrady, 656.

Though these proceedings were revolutionary and in their general course corresponded rather closely with the Revolution of 1689 in England, they were viewed with decided approval by the British government, and especially by the board of trade, the more active members of which had been working toward such a result since the days of Edward Randolph. The enthusiasm with which the people of South Carolina now welcomed royal government appears as an effective and dramatic close to the long campaign against the proprietors which had begun with the attack on Massachusetts soon after the Restoration. For three decades and more to come policy in this direction ceased to be aggressive, until it was resumed as part of the far broader movement that led to the general colonial revolt. And yet the results which had thus far been achieved at Charlestown were only provisional. They must be ratified in England, and even then, unless further steps were taken, they would only bring the governmental powers of the proprietors to an end in the province. Their right to the land would continue unimpaired. The result, in other words, would be similar to that reached in Maryland and New Jersey. Beyond that point, indeed, for a decade after the uprising the settlement with the Carolina proprietors did not advance.

At the time when matters came to a crisis disputes concerning titles to the original shares of the earl of Clarendon and Sir William Berkeley were unsettled and several years were to pass before they reached a final adjudication in the Chancery or House of Lords.¹ These were purely questions of property, involving purchase, sale or inheritances arising between parties in England and subject to the jurisdiction of its courts the same as if the land involved had been situated in the realm. The questions were of a character similar to those which at the same time were agitating the Penn family. Until they were settled it was impossible to arrange a transfer of title to the land of the province to the crown, and they were not settled until 1725. In the suit over the Clarendon share the English relatives of Chief Justice Trott were closely interested. Occasionally during the interval the proprietors tried to assert powers of government by the appointment of officials for the province, but these were not recognized and no progress in that direction was made.

¹ McCrady, op. cit. 673 et seq., 714.

As the revolt in South Carolina occurred just at the time of the speculative excitement in England known as the South Sea bubble, it was quite natural that some of the proprietors should form the project of a company to which as an investment they hoped to sell the province for a good round price.¹ This, of course, never came to anything except to increase the irritation of the colonists toward proprietors who had so obviously ventured to treat them as an object of sale and speculation. In the winter of 1719/20 Barnwell joined the other two agents in London, bringing with him authentic news of what had happened at Charlestown, and a petition from the convention or assembly there that South Carolina might be made a royal province.²

In justification of this they presented a list of ten grievances against the proprietors. These covered the entire record of neglect and misgovernment on the part of the proprietors from the reactionary church legislation of 1704 through the neglect of defence against Indians, Spaniards and pirates during the succeeding years, the misdeeds of Trott, the repeal of the recent acts and the exclusion of settlers from the lands just won from the Indians in order that they might be appropriated to the use of the proprietors.

At the time when this address was presented the king was absent on the continent, and the lords justices expressed the hasty conclusion that the proprietors had forfeited their charter. The attorney general was therefore ordered to procure a writ of scire facias against them. But this plan was not pursued, very possibly because of the difficulty, under the very general terms of the charter, of proving such misgovernment as would justify forfeiture by judicial process. Of general neglect the proprietors had long been guilty, and they had neglected the northern part of the province much more than the southern. But the people of North Carolina expressed no dissatisfaction and its council sent to them a loyal address and refused to recognize Moore as their governor.¹ The situation was really one which called for political adjustment, and it was decided to wait until the conflicting claims among the proprietors had been settled and then to negotiate a contract with them for the surrender of their territorial rights, the whole to be confirmed and legalized by an act of parliament.

¹ N. C. Col. Recs., II, 384. McCrady, op. cit. 669.

² C. O. 5/382, Petition of council and assembly to king, Feb. 3, 1719/20.

But the crown proceeded immediately to the organizing of royal government in the province, though from the nature of the case it must remain in some sense provisional until the territorial relations could be adjusted in the way just indicated. The veteran Sir Francis Nicholson was selected as the first royal governor, a choice which illustrated the power of routine rather than an intelligent desire to further the interests of South Carolina. His commission was naturally modelled after that of the late Governor Copley, of Maryland, while his instructions conformed in all general respects with those of other royal governors. He arrived in the province, accompanied by Barnwell, in May 1721. Royal government was then instituted in accordance with the usual forms. Johnson, the ex-governor, ceased all efforts to exercise authority in the name of the proprietors and joined with the people and legislature in a full recognition of the new government.² The new council, twelve in number, included Alexander Skene, Ralph Izard, William Bull, Thomas Smith, Joseph Morton and Francis Yonge. All proprietary officials were required to bring in their commissions for perusal, while the councillors were asked to present a list of such as were fit to be further employed. A large number of new appointments were soon made, among these being James Smith as judge of admiralty, Benjamin Whitaker as attorney general, Charles Hart as secretary. The council voted that Trott ought not to be continued in the position of chief justice and Francis Yonge seems to have been named for that place, though very soon after he was sent with John Lloyd as agent to England. A complete list of militia officers and local magistrates for the counties was also appointed. James Moore was chosen speaker of the assembly, while Moore and Robert Johnson were associated as lieutenant generals in command of the militia. A new receiver and treasurer of the province was appointed in the place of Rhett but he held his office in the customs until his death, early in 1723,¹ though grave charges were made against him of being concerned with Captain Hildersley, of the Flamborough, in trade with the Spaniards in St. Augustine.²

¹ N. C. Col. Recs., II, 374, 375, 382.

² C. O. 3/425, Min. of Ex.C.

Before Nicholson's appointment the attention of the home government had been repeatedly called to the importance of establishing an armed post on the Altamaha river. When, in 1717, Sir Robert Montgomery applied for a grant of the territory between Savannah and Altamaha rivers under the name of the Margravate of Azilia, one of the strong arguments used in support of the project was that it would be a barrier against the Spanish and Indians. Attorney General Northey suggested at that time that the Carolina proprietors surrender their rights of government over this region, so that it might be erected into a royal province.³ This proposal the proprietors did not accept and the plan was abandoned until Oglethorpe revived it in a permanent form with the founding of Georgia. Boone and Barnwell, in their reports to the board of trade, insisted strongly on this as an important part of a comprehensive plan of defence against the Spaniards and French. As the result of their representations and of its own knowledge of the needs of the southern frontiers, the board made an elaborate report to the king on this subject.⁴ It insisted that an independent company should be sent over, with sufficient ordnance supplies, to serve as a garrison and that several hundred acres near by the post should be laid

¹ McCrady, S. C. under Royal Govt., 56.

² S. C. Entry Bk. C. O. 15/400.

³ Colls. of S. C. Hist. Soc. II, 232, 233, 234, 256.

⁴ S. C. Entry Bk. C. C. 5/400, Sept. 23, 1720.

out as a town, so that abundant food supplies might be at hand and a permanent establishment insured. Much correspondence on this subject passed between Barnwell, Nicholson and the various offices in London, while the governor's instructions were preparing and afterwards.¹ The advice of the board of trade was followed in all essential particulars. The company was sent and its commander was ordered carefully to examine the adjacent country and report to Nicholson whether in his judgment the post should be located on St. Simon's Island or on the mainland. Nicholson, on his arrival, informed the council of the king's design and they recommended Barnwell as the person best fitted to have charge of it. At the request of the governor and council he presented a memorial on the subject, and it was then ordered that the building of the fort be left to him, and such a commission and instructions as he approved were drawn and duly signed. A sloop was hired for his use and the lieutenant of the independent company was ordered to deliver ordnance stores to him, as also were the powder receiver and commander of the forts at Charlestown. A site near the mouth of the Altamaha was selected for the post and when the works were completed they were named Fort King George. Thus a work of defence was begun on the extreme southern frontier and it was intended to be more of a fort and town and less of a trading post than Oswego, which was founded at about the same time on Lake Ontario. In both instances the forward step was the direct result of the intervention of the crown or of the activity of its appointees.

In connection with the building and maintenance of Fort King George, however, the usual difficulties had to be experienced and in part overcome. The independent company which came over with Nicholson consisted of 94 men and it was kept for a time in barracks at Port Royal. The engineer who, it had been promised, should accompany them, did not arrive until the late fall of 1721.² The heat and moisture of the climate was a perpetual menace to health. As funds for the enterprise had to be furnished by the assembly the details of its management were presented to both houses by Barnwell and the governor, and they were considered in connection with the general system of defence of the province. At the close of the proprietary period this consisted of the defences of Charlestown, a fort on the Santee, one at Port Royal, Fort Moore at Savannah Town just below the modern Augusta, Georgia, and Congaree Fort near the site of the present city of Columbia.¹ The assembly made the usual objections to paying the cost of building Fort King George and were inclined to make an appropriation only if the governor would assure them that the king would reimburse the province. Nicholson replied that the extra charge would not be great and he would present their desires in reference to the matter to the crown. The appropriation was made, as requested,² but during the discussions the commons house expressed its mind freely as to the location of the fort and the proposed removal of certain people from Port Royal to settle in its neighborhood. Nicholson also had to yield to their demand that the soldiers of the independent company should be put promptly into service at Port Royal and Fort Moore. The lower house took the chief part in designating commissaries for these posts and fixing their salaries and in arrangements for transferring troops from one to another. As the province had long been under only nominal control from England, it was natural that the legislature should practically determine the number of the garrisons, should fix salaries and prescribe or greatly influence all appointments in the militia. The assembly also insisted that the cost of provisioning the independent company should not be in excess of that of the province militia and that a contract should be made for this purpose at accepted rates. Barnwell was voted a liberal allowance for his services previous to the arrival of the engineer. In all these matters the lower house was most active and influential.³

¹ C. O. 5/358.

² This was Capt. John Barker; Upper House J. Feb. 9, 1721/2, et seq. The journals of the two houses show that this man had dealings with them in reference to the fort, the opening of better communication by water with it and the disposition of the independent company. Much business was done during these years respecting all these matters for the full tracing of which my space is quite inadequate.

¹ Smith, South Carolina as a Royal Prov., 192, 208; C. O. 5/425, U. H. Journal, 1721.

² In all about £11000 sterling was expended by the province on Fort King George. U. H. Sess. of May 1722.

³ Upper and Lower House Journals, 1720-21.

The Spanish authorities at St. Augustine at once complained to their home government of the building of the fort on the Altamaha as a bold encroachment on what, in the absence of settled boundaries, they regarded as their own territory. The Spanish minister in London promptly reported the act to the English government as a grievance.¹ This was also accompanied by complaints of Indian outrages in Florida. The board of trade was called upon for a report on the boundary question thus raised and in reply defended the claim of the English as expressed in the Carolina charters of 1663 and 1665, asserting that this had been adequately supported by trade with the Indians in that region and now by settlement, while the Spaniards had no post north of St. Augustine, one hundred miles to the south. Orders were sent to the two governors, of Florida and South Carolina respectively, to meet and reach an amicable agreement as to the boundary. Two envoys were sent from St. Augustine to Charlestown in 1725. Arthur Middleton was then in charge of the government, and the discussion between him and his council on the one side and the Spaniards on the other resulted in nothing whatever affecting the boundary, most of the time apparently being spent in discussing the treatment of fugitive debtors, felons and slaves. But a few months later, that is, early in 1726, the fort on the Altamaha was burned. Capt. Edward Massey was sent from England to take command there and the fort was carelessly rebuilt at the expense of South Carolina. According to the statement of Nicholson, the garrison was too lazy to cultivate their gardens or even to fetch pure water. But Massey insisted, after he had been there for a time, that the post was too remote, its location too unhealthy and the garrison too weak and too much exposed to diseases which arose from the eating of salt provisions to justify its continuance. He said that the province denied quarters for recruits and the common necessities of camp life; that there was no guard house, no oven for baking bread or fire-place where the men could boil their meat; they had cannon but no ball, rammers or sponge. These representations he made in 1727 in a letter to Henry ¹ C. O. 5/359. S. C. Orig. Papers, Sept., 1721, May, 1723; C. O. 5/400, S. C. Entry Bk. Dec., 1722; McCrady, op. cit. 74 et seq.

Pelham, and on the strength of these representations and of the unwillingness of the province to do more, the post was abandoned and the garrison withdrawn to Port Royal. The region of the Altamaha then remained unoccupied until the founding of Georgia, a few years later, and till removed to that colony the independent company was kept at Port Royal.

As was always the case, Indian relations were closely involved with plans for defence in South Carolina. By an act of 1716, passed under the influence of the Yemassee war, the board of Indian commissioners of the province had been incorporated¹ and a complete monopoly of the trade conferred upon them, the net profits of which were to go into the public treasury. Because of complaints on the part of the traders and others, the proprietors in 1718 disallowed this act. But in March of the following year another act was passed reestablishing the incorporated board of commissioners, though with its monopolistic powers slightly reduced.² Three commissioners were named in this act and, subject to responsibility to the assembly, they were given full authority over the employment of agents, the licensing of traders, sales of furs and skins bought from the natives and of Indian goods procured from England and the keeping of accounts. Trade was to be carried on at three factories only, Fort Moore, Congaree Fort and at Apalachicola Old Town on the Savannah river, the last named place being substituted for Winyaw in the previous act.³ Private traders might, though with difficulty, procure annual licenses from this board on paying a fee and giving bonds in £500 each to deal justly with the Indians and with their fellow traders and obey all the instructions which were given them. All traders who were not licensed might be ordered away by the commissioners, and those who were licensed were taxed ten per cent on their Indian purchases and were forbidden to trade within twenty miles of a garrison.

This system was continued until 1721, when the corporate powers were taken from the commissioners and much less rigid restrictions were imposed upon Indian trade.⁴ The new

¹ Statutes, II, 677-680; Smith, S. C. as a Royal Prov., 214 et seq.; Osgood, op. cit. II, 409, 417-419.

² Stats. III, 86-96.

³ Winyaw was in the north.

⁴ Stats. III, 141-146.

appointees were William Bull, George Chicken, who distinguished himself in the Yemassee war, and John Herbert. By this act trade with certain small bodies of Indians who lived adjacent to the white settlements was thrown open, but annual licenses were required for traffic with all remoter and comparatively independent tribes. The conditions under which these were granted were made somewhat easier, though an annual journey to Charlestown on the part of those who desired licenses was required and a considerable license fee was collected.¹ The close connection between Indian policy and defence was also illustrated by the requirement that the commissioners should twice a year visit all the forts and garrisons in the province, including that on the Altamaha, and inspect their condition and that of their soldiers and their supplies; they might order such changes and improvements there as they saw fit and the officers must obey these requirements.

Indian traders from Virginia who had to pass into or across the remoter parts of South Carolina to reach the Creeks and Cherokees, and who, though not expressly mentioned, were included under the terms of this act, complained of the great inconvenience of the annual journeys of hundreds of miles to Charlestown which they would be compelled to make to procure licenses. The difficulties which were involved in this were so great that they might amount to a total prohibition of an old established trade. This, as well as earlier legislation of South Carolina, indicated a purpose to exclude Virginians entirely from Indian trade within her borders, and this policy had long been the occasion of disputes and complaints. The Virginians now presented their grievance to the home government through John Carter, who was then the agent of that province in England. Yonge, the Carolina agent, made no reply to this. The board of trade referred the question to their counsel, Richard West, who submitted a careful report, in October 1722.² In harmony with an opinion which had been expressed by the board in 1709, he condemned the requirements of the South Carolina law as arbitrary and inconsistent with intercolonial comity. Notwithstanding this favorable report, it does not appear that the act was repealed. In fact, the main features of it were continued for years to come. But it was thought that money might be saved by imposing upon the governor and council the duties, including those of inspecting the forts and garrisons, which had been entrusted to a special board of commissioners, and that change was made by an act of 1722.¹ But it was soon found that this, in addition to their other duties, imposed too heavy a burden on the governor and council, and in 1723 the duties in question were bestowed on a sole commissioner, James Moore being named for that office. Moore died a few days after his appointment and George Chicken was the first appointee really to serve under this law. With the exception of a few months in 1751-2, this system was continued in force by South Carolina until, in 1756, the crown took the administration of Indian affairs out of the hands of the individual colonies and organized them under two commissioners, South Carolina constituting a part of the southern district.²

¹ From time to time Indian conferences were also held at Charlestown, and to these there are many references in the journals of the two houses. Cherokees, Creeks and others came thither and met the governor and members of the council. For the south in this relation Charlestown corresponded in a way to Albany for the north, but it was never so important a centre for Indian conferences as was Albany. See, e. g., C. O. 5/359, S. C. Original P., Mar. 2, 1723.

² Chalmers, Colonial Opinions, 592.

During Nicholson's administration the only subject which aroused serious controversy was that of the issue of bills of credit and this question, when once raised, continued uppermost until after the complete establishment of royal government and the arrival of Robert Johnson as governor. Reference has elsewhere been made to the origin of such issues in South Carolina and to the failure of its government to redeem them as provided in the acts of issue until depreciation had advanced to considerable length. The excuse for this — and it carried considerable weight — was the frightful losses and sufferings caused by the Yemassee war and the need of protecting the colony by means of forts and other defences against the Spanish and French. These certainly imposed a heavy burden upon its small population and limited resources. In common with all the other colonies it also suffered from a lack of specie and also from the difficulty of keeping such supplies of coin as did come in the course of trade. It was the planter element, constituting the great majority of the members of the lower house, which demanded ever increasing issues of paper and the indefinite postponement of the dates of their redemption. On the other side stood the merchants and importers of Charlestown, who filled most of the seats in the council and who, like the British merchants with whom they had continuous dealings, suffered from the fluctuations in exchange caused by excessive issues of paper and its consequent depreciation. As creditors they were ever exposed under such a régime to the danger or even the certainty of loss. The conflict between the two houses over this question was essentially one between the debtors and creditors in the province, and the creditors stood with the crown officials in opposition to the demand for ever increasing issues of paper. Nicholson occupied to such an extent a neutral position between the two that he did not come to an open breach with the lower house.

¹ Stats. III, 184.

² Smith, op. cit., 218.

In 1712 a so-called bank act had been passed which provided for the issue of £52,000 in bills of credit, £16,000 of which were to go toward the redemption of old bills, £4,000 for contingencies and the remaining £32,000 to be loaned at 12½% interest per annum for twelve years.¹ One-twelfth of these loans, together with the interest must be promptly paid every years, and the security for the payments was mortgages on land and negroes to double the amounts borrowed. At the end of the period, if all worked well, the government would have received back the total original issue with a profit. The bills were made compulsory legal tender for all debts. This was one of the typical land bank schemes which were so favored among advocates of paper money in the eighteenth century.

But the plan did not work. The issues of 1712 so depreciated the value of the currency that by 1715 its ratio to sterling was two to one. Then came the Yemassee war which stopped payments on the emission of 1712 and occasioned two other issues aggregating £50,000. Funds intended for the redemption of these bills were diverted to other purposes, but no more issues were made until 1720, when Moore, the revolutionary governor, approved an emission of £34,000. These were known as rice bills, for they were to be redeemed by taxes payable in rice at 30s. per hundred. Depreciation had now advanced to such an extreme that the rate of exchange between sterling and paper was five to one.

¹ Smith, op. cit., 232 et seq. Bull's Account of the Rise of Credit and Progress of Bills of Credit in S. C. 1740, C. O. 5/365; printed in S. C. Stats. IX, 766-780, and in Sound Currency, V, No. 4; Journal of the two houses.

But in 1722 and 1723 Nicholson assented to two acts which were still further to increase inflation.¹ The former of these provided for the levy of a direct tax, but it also contained a clause for the reissue of £15,000 in rice bills which should have been destroyed. The latter was intended in part to further a new and fresh issue to take the place of the old and worn bills which were then in circulation under several previous issues. For the former purpose £40,000 were provided, and for the latter £80,000, the total amount in bills now ordered to be printed being £120,000. The provision made for the redemption of the £40,000 was not to become operative until 1738 and was then to continue at the rate of £5,000 per annum until 1745. The entire issue was made full legal tender.

Over the latter of these measures the issue was finally drawn between the supporters and the opponents of the policy. In an elaborate report the committee of ways and means of the lower house claimed that there was much less proclamation money per head in South Carolina than there was sterling per capita in England,² which very likely was true. They referred to the certain destruction of many bills during the Indian war and told how, with the revival of trade after the war, there was a stringency and many actions for debt, usurers exacting 25% and 30% from those who could not procure bills even in exchange for the most valuable commodities. Because of its scarcity, silver could be procured either not at all or only at very high prices, and people were being forced to leave the province. What little silver they had was being carried off by traders from the northern colonies in exchange for their commodities. The prices of clothing and other necessities were so high that the soldiers in the frontier garrisons were forced to pledge all their wages and more long before they were paid, and this furnished them a strong temptation to desert and leave the frontier unprotected in a time of increasing danger. The charges of the government during the ensuing year would amount to over £43,000, while the revenue from duties not expressly appropriated would be only £6800, leaving a balance to be covered by taxes of nearly £37,000. Recent losses from winds and floods had rendered the inhabitants incapable of raising this by taxation, and the issue of more bills of credit was their only resource. It was after a full consideration of this report that the second of the above mentioned acts was passed.

¹ Stats. III, 149, 188 et seq.

² L. H. Journal, Nov. and Dec. 1722.

In the previous session one Francis Goddard had been compelled to apologize for a violent attack he had made upon the assembly.¹ At the same time also a committee which had been appointed to consider an Essay on the Nature of the Public Credit, which had been offered to the house, reported that a number of persons ought to be taken into custody for casting reflections on the assembly. In the fall session the attack on the policy of the house was renewed in the form of a memorial from the merchants of Charlestown,² reviewing the experience of the province with bills of credit from the beginning. They showed how promises of redemption made in the laws had always been broken and how in the resulting depreciation and rise of the rate of exchange creditors had lost most or all of the sums that were due them. Orders from the proprietors to Governor Johnson and others had proved powerless to check the evil. It was plain that the bills then out had no intrinsic value, and traders had to contract for the produce of the country rather than for money, while London merchants were prevented from trading with the province at all. All who received salaries or fixed incomes were suffering and in general they feared that South Carolina was approaching bankruptcy.

With these arguments a group of creditors, bound by their contracts in Europe, and a community of planters faced each other, the latter unprovided or very poorly furnished with coin, always on the verge of barter, securing temporary credit at enormous cost, living isolated and exposed from time to time to withering disasters. They were fluctuating between a system of barter and one of money economy and were unable to adapt themselves to either. The British government should have furnished them with an adequate coinage or have encouraged the province to provide them with one, as Massachusetts had done in the previous century. Had this been done, for all the colonies, many a perplexing problem of finance would have been solved and irritation prevented. As it was, the colonists were left in a condition of chaos to flounder about as best they might. As Nicholson evidently felt, and many another governor as well, there was much to be said for the arguments which they urged. The picture which they gave of their difficulties bears the marks of truth, and in the reply which the house made to the memorial of the merchants it denied all design to injure or defraud any one. But injury was inflicted, as the merchants were quite able to show.

¹ Journal for Session of May and June 1722.

² L. H. J. Dec. 6, 1722; C. O. 5/358, S. C. Orig. Papers.

The sensitiveness of the house under the charges of bad faith which were made by the merchants was shown by its taking into custody those who had signed the memorial, on the ground that it was false and scandalous, a base reflection on earlier proceedings of the assembly and a high indignity to the present house. The merchants petitioned the governor and council to be heard and the latter resolved that it was a privilege of English subjects that they should be heard, though afterwards they might be returned into custody.¹ This the commons house declared to be a breach of its privileges, it being impossible that they should be released except by the power that committed them. To the governor they insisted upon their right as the sole representative house to consider first all petitions against bills, especially those which concerned money and supplies, and in case the bill in question was passed by the lower house, that then the petitioners might be heard before the governor and council. But further controversy over this episode was prevented by the accused merchants confessing their fault and paying their fees. A conference was then held between the houses, the council claiming that the issue of £30,000 in addition to the amount which was required to replace the old bills would suffice, but the commons house had its way and the bill became law. The merchants then petitioned in London for repeal of the currency act of 1721 as well as that of 1722. They secured an order to that effect in August, 1723,¹ together with an instruction to Nicholson not to consent to any law for increasing paper credit or altering funds for redeeming bills before royal government was established and to urge the assembly to provide sufficient funds for the speedy redemption of the bills which had since been issued. A sinking fund act² was accordingly passed in February, 1723/4, providing for the redemption of the £53,000 which had been issued under the two repealed laws by revenue from customs duties, and as the bills were paid in they should be burned every six months until all had been destroyed.

¹ U. H. J. Dec. 12, 1722 et seq.

With the merchants in their attack on bills of credit cooperated Richard Shelton, the secretary of the proprietors. He also at this time opposed before the board of trade an act for the incorporation of Charlestown, stating that it had been secretly passed against the wish of the majority of the inhabitants, was illegal and in various ways undesirable.³ The agent, Yonge, defended the act against these charges, and Counsellor West in an opinion approved of many of its provisions, though not of the appointment of the mayor and other officers for life. The act, however, was repealed. The complacent attitude of Nicholson toward paper money and his approval of the Charlestown act were now urged by his opponents along with other reasons for his recall. The committee of the privy council heard the complaints of the merchants on this subject, and as Nicholson was advanced in years and now asked for a license to come to England, it was granted, and his activities in the colonies finally terminated in 1725. Until he went, however, and thereafter, the lower house kept up the agitation over the currency, seeking to evade the new sinking fund law and also to secure new issues.⁴ In October 1724, the merchants complained to the board of

¹ C. O. 5/259. S. C. Orig. Papers; C. O. 5/400. S. C. Entry Book.

² Stata, III, 219.

³ Ibid., 179. The text of this is not extant.

⁴ See the Journals of both houses for the years in question; also C. O. 5/359, Orig. Papers, Aug. 1724 et seq.

trade that they were still compelled to take paper and that the duties imposed for the redemption of bills laid a burden on British manufactures. On the other hand, crops were good and trade was on the increase and, therefore, in the opinion of the governor, the grand jury, the petty jury and the council, the merchants in 1725 were not greatly suffering and the amount of paper money was not more than sufficient for the needs of trade.¹

With the accession of Arthur Middleton, a native of the province, to the lead in affairs as president of the council, the planter element naturally thought that the prospect was good for a continuance of their favorite policy. Their idea was that about £100,000 in currency was needed as a permanent sum in circulation to make exchange and business easy in South Carolina.² The event which brought up again the question of more issues was the burning of Fort King George early in 1726. Middleton insisted that the post should not be abandoned and called for an appropriation or rather a loan to the king of £3,000 for rebuilding it.³ The house replied that the fines and forfeitures would be sufficient till the king's pleasure was known. Middleton replied that these could not be used because the respective rights of the king and proprietors had not yet been determined. After other proposals had failed of approval the assembly urged that the paper money be used which was lying in the treasurer's hands ready to be burned. To this Middleton assented, though, as it was an evasion of the sinking fund, he requested that the grant be made in the form of an ordinance or joint resolution, which was done. But in connection with this act sharp criticisms passed between Middleton and the assembly growing out of the sale of certain offices by the president on which severe comments had been made by Benjamin Whitaker, attorney general and one of its members.⁴ These were duly reported to the home government.

¹ C. O. 5/359, Sept., Nov. 1725.

² This is stated in a petition of the assembly to the king, May 13, 1625; C. O. 5/383.

³ Journal of the two houses, Feb., 1725/6, et seq.; C. O. 5/428; Smith, op. cit., 244 et seq.

⁴ Journal of L. H. Feb. 3 and 4, 1725/6; see also Entry Book and Orig. Papers, 1728, C. O. 5/400, C. O. 5/350.

Another plan which was early brought forward by the assembly for the issue of £40,000 additional was rejected by the council on the ground that the existing currency was sufficient, while Middleton excused himself from approving it by citing the instruction which forbade the eldest councillor when administering the government to pass any except the most necessary acts without a special order from the king. Early in 1727 another attempt was made to increase the circulation by an issue of £86,000 in bills, but this the council rejected.¹ Thus affairs drifted on without the planters and farmers being able to attain their object, and after the passage in March, 1727, of the bill for the year the assembly was prorogued until the following October.

Almost immediately meetings began in the country parishes.² An association was formed and statements of grievances prepared to be sent to the president and council. In this it was declared that the people were the victims of a clique of lawyers, merchants and rapacious officials at Charlestown who hoarded the money of the province and charged exorbitant prices and fees. The farmers, to get money to pay their debts and taxes, were compelled to sell their estates often at a fourth of their real value. The concentration of courts of justice at Charlestown greatly increased their burdens and the power of the greedy combination against the people. In addition to relief from the steadily contracting currency, a demand was made for the more general trial of cases in county and precinct courts. Thomas Smith, son of Landgrave Smith and a member of the assembly from St. James's, Santee, was one of the leaders, and his arrest by one of the council increased the tumult and finally a body of 200 armed men appeared before the council chamber at Charlestown and delivered their representation to the president. They, however, withdrew without violence and soon a general meeting of the rioters was arranged to be held in July at Dry Savannah, about twenty miles from Charlestown. Landgrave Thomas Smith, a member of the council, now joined the rioters and was evidently planning to seize the presidency, when Middleton had him arrested and called out the militia to prevent the meeting at Dry Savannah and protect the government at Charlestown. The militia of Goose Creek, under Capt. William Dry, now took the lead among the opposition and prepared to seize Alexander Skene by way of reprisal.

¹ C. O. 5/429; Journal of L. H. Jan. & Feb., 1726/7.

² Smith, op. cit., 246 et seq. A representation of the council of S. C. to the king, 1729, C. O. 5/360; also in same vol. letters of Middleton to Eng. in 1727-8. An abstract of this is printed in Colls. and various other material of S. C. Hist. Soc., 300; Journals of the two houses, 1727-1730.

As the agitation continued, the assembly was called together on August 1. It at once passed a series of vigorous resolutions to the effect that the right to present grievances jointly or separately and to petition for their redress was at stake, that all commitments and prosecutions for such petitioning were illegal and that whoever asserted the contrary was a betrayer of the rights and liberties of the people. It also denied that it had ever proposed to the council any bills that were disadvantageous to the public or contrary to royal instructions and condemned all statements to the contrary as reflections upon its honor. Petitions and complaints from the various parishes were heard and copies of these resolutions were given to the petitioners to be circulated through the province. Landgrave Smith also presented a memorial praying for a writ of habeas corpus to free him from his illegal imprisonment. He stated that some seamen from a man-of-war had aided in his arrest, and complained of the chief justice for refusing to grant him the writ, and asked to be heard before the bar of the house. This request was at once granted. The council was greatly offended that one of their members should thus apply to the house for redress, and Middleton interposed in the name of the "royal prerogative," and commanded that all papers relating to Smith be sent to the council and that the assembly cease its interference in his case. This it did not do, but listened to the argument of his attorney, Nicholas Trott, at their bar to the effect that Smith was rightfully entitled to the writ of habeas corpus. Had it not been for threatened hostilities with the Spanish and Indians, the assembly would upon this have been dissolved; but instead the president and council decided to prorogue them for a month.

But attacks of the Yemassee on the southern frontier necessitated the meeting of the house again on August 23.

To equip a body of militia and build necessary forts they proposed to appropriate the duties arising under the sinking fund act and to loan the bills which were in the treasury waiting to be burned. To this the council agreed, though unwillingly, on condition that as soon as possible provision be made by a tax for the repayment of this money and that it be burned. As the Indian troubles occasioned an expedition under Colonel William Palmer which ravaged the scattered Spanish settlements in Florida up to the gates of St. Augustine, the subject of defence occupied for some time much attention in the assembly and outside. The French also were becoming more active among the Creeks and Cherokees, as was evidenced by the building of Fort Alabama some distance up the Mobile river and the presence of their agents among these tribes. This also demanded attention, and Captain Tobias Fitch was sent to counteract French influence among the Creeks and Colonel George Chicken on a similar errand among the Cherokees.

It was the desire of Middleton and the council to keep the attention of the lower house fixed upon these questions of defence, but the crisis offered too favorable a chance for exerting pressure on the subject of the currency, and from this the assembly was not to be diverted. It also appears that planters had been purchasing many negroes, for whom they had run in debt to the merchant inspectors. These debts they were finding it increasingly difficult to pay as the currency began to contract and the rate of exchange to decline under the enforcement of the sinking fund act. Hence the outcry continued. And now Whitaker and the other leaders in the house brought forward the ambitious scheme of fixing by law both the amount of currency which should be in circulation in the province and its rate of exchange with proclamation money. By this means they proposed to check the redemption of outstanding bills and keep the exchange value of the whole body of currency practically where it was at that time, 1728. There was a little more than £100,000 in bills outstanding and that or a little more they conceived to be necessary for the easy transaction of such volume of business as the province then had.¹

¹ Their best statement of this view is in the long message to the council of March 6, 1727/8, in reply to an equally full statement of the opposing views of the council under date of the 29th of the previous February.

Proclamation money was then about five times as valuable as South Carolina currency; the ratio of exchange between the two was 5 to 1. "It is undeniable," said the committee of the house, "that the value of paper money is not intrinsic as that of silver has become, but depends on the faith of the government that creates it. Now we would support our bills at the rate of £500 of our bills for £100 proclamation money. Since they are thus brought to a standard and their value ascertained, why should it not be declared by a law that invades no man's property but ascertains it, which is indeed easing the people but with the utmost justice by letting every one know what he has to pay?" Certainly this was a able statement in its extreme form of the doctrine that money is the creature of law.

They also contended that the values of the two forms of money in the province were already bound together by law in the provisions under which fees and fines were being paid, an act of 1721 specifying the equivalent rates of these in both currency and proclamation money. What the theorists of the lower house claimed that they were trying to do was to make this universal by extending it to all contracts and payments. They also claimed that such a law would not violate the governor's instruction because it was a subject of very universal importance; and that it would not violate the act of parliament which specified the rates at which proclamation money should circulate, because the object of that was to prevent the overvaluing of money by indirect practices in order to draw it from one colony to another.

But the council held immovably to the opinion that such a law as this would nullify the act relating to proclamation money, that it would violate the governor's instruction and could not be passed without a suspending clause. It reviewed the history of the controversy thus far, dwelling forcibly on the seditious conduct of the opposition throughout the province. They had endeavored by all possible arts to keep the currency afloat despite orders for sinking it. And now, in their frantic attempts to accomplish this, they were proposing by law to settle the course of exchange "which is always governed by trade," "a thing never before attempted in any part of Europe, much less in subordinate governments in America." Carrying further their analysis of the way in which the bill must operate, they showed that the assembly must fix periodically the rate of discount on paper bills and the rates and proportions they should bear to proclamation money, and the courts would be bound to recognize these rates without argument. By this process, if possible, the council held, the rating of coin must be changed as well as that of the bills, and so the act of 6th of Anne would be violated. They enlarged upon the losses and sufferings of creditors which resulted from the depreciation of the currency and dwelt on the purpose of the assembly to keep this condition permanent until debtors could all discharge their obligations in depreciated currency, without regard to the rate of exchange when the debts were incurred.

At intervals during this long controversy the existence of assemblies was terminated by encounters over personal questions. One instance of this kind arose from the revival of the case of Landgrave Smith in May 1728. He had now lain in jail a year, because of the refusal of Allein, the chief justice, to grant the writ of habeas corpus. The judge was served by the house with a very strong memorial on his conduct and ordered to attend at the bar. He refused; the house resented this and ordered its messenger to take him into custody. The messenger found Allein at a session of the council and tried to arrest him there, but was turned out of the room by the president. This conduct the house denounced as arbitrary, unprecedented and a violation of its privileges. A dissolution followed, but as nearly all the old members were returned at the next election, it was without result. Early in the following year a dissolution was occasioned by the arrest of the deputy secretary under order of the house because he refused, as an officer of the governor and council, to answer certain of its questions about papers in his custody. Of these later assemblies William Dry, who had previously commanded the insurgent Goose Creek militia, was regularly elected the speaker. At intervals Indian affairs and defence were discussed and some consideration was given to tax bills, but in every case the currency issue blocked legislation, especially that which called for appropriations and expenditures. Middleton held stiffly to his connection with the merchant group at Charlestown and was wholly unable to effect a compromise. By temperament as well as by his close connection with factions in the province he was unfitted for this. His administration was therefore a failure and when Robert Johnson arrived as the first royal governor in the full sense of the term, he found the province in a disturbed and weakened state.

Throughout the decade while these events were occurring the control of the proprietors over the land of the province legally continued. But as they had no distinct land office and no record appears of any resident officials in South Carolina to enforce their rights, Governor Nicholson seems to have freely granted lands. The proprietors complained that he made extravagant grants, but that was denied and decisive proof on the subject is not at hand. Of the fact that the proprietors during these years emphasized the provisional character of royal government in South Carolina there is abundant proof. Nicholson and other officials continued writing to Lord Carteret as palatine, not only about such matters as the building of the fort on the Altamaha, but about strictly local affairs which would not be brought before a minister who was not at the same time a proprietor.¹ Trott and the Rhetts were specially interested, of course, in the restoration of the proprietary régime and used such influence as they still had to bring it about. They repeatedly complained of Nicholson's proceedings as being in utter disregard of proprietary interests. Nicholson had a personal quarrel with the elder Rhett over the appointment of a naval officer and denounced him as a "haughty and insolent fellow" and "cheating scoundrel." Rhett in turn insisted that Nicholson should be turned out and he himself appointed governor. The question of bills of credit also played its part in these complaints, while the dissenters naturally had some criticisms to make of so pronounced an Anglican as Nicholson.

In 1726, after the retirement of Nicholson, the proprietors went so far as to urge the crown to approve of the appointment of Colonel Samuel Horsey, under their commission, as governor of South Carolina. This was opposed by the council and assembly of the province in a petition to the king that they might remain under royal government. A return to the proprietary régime, they said, would be followed by the loss of the province to England. Francis Yonge, the agent, presented this petition and it was referred to a committee of the council for report. Yonge also kept the authorities in the province informed as to the doings of the proprietors in this connection. They petitioned for the issue of additional instructions to the governor to assist in the collection of their rents and in other ways, and in this they spoke of the governor as "provisional." Shelton, the secretary of the proprietors, also prepared a memorial, containing many arguments to show that the suspension of their authority in 1719 was the work of a minority of the inhabitants, that its consequences were very imperfect and that their power should be restored. This was printed under the title of the "Case of the Lords Proprietors of South Carolina" and circulated among the members of the privy council.¹ These arguments were duly answered by the agent and they were too inconsistent with the interests of the crown, particularly in the case of a border province, to change the natural course of events. In 1729 the question was finally settled in a manner which will be described in the following chapter on the northern part of the original province.

¹ S. C. Hist. Colls. I, 230 et seq.

¹ C. O. 5/383, A. W. S. S. C. 1715-1736; papers and letters under date of 1726.

CHAPTER III

TRANSITION TO ROYAL GOVERNMENT IN NORTH CAROLINA

IN earlier volumes of this work the unformed and chaotic conditions which existed in North Carolina have been briefly described. This province in its early days exhibited more of the characteristics of a purely frontier community than did any of the other colonies. Owing to the neglect of the proprietors, its settlers in matters of government were left largely to their own devices. The lack of a port, or of a coast line which offered facilities for direct trade with Europe, confined them to coastwise traffic with colonies to the north and south, and this was carried on mostly by New Englanders. Thrown back on their own meagre resources, the inhabitants made most of the coarse cloth which they wore and lived without the comforts or luxuries of Europe. Their exclusion from the direct trade with Europe proved a serious obstacle to the introduction of negroes and, when taken in connection with the policy which prevailed of restricting the size of land grants, it preserved this colony to a considerable extent from the régime of slavery. European goods were received largely through Virginia and at enhanced prices. Beginning in 1679, Virginia prohibited the importation of tobacco into her territory from Carolina or other localities outside the capes, there to be "laid on shore, sold or shipped."¹ As tobacco was then the chief product which the people of North Carolina raised for export and as they had no port which vessels coming direct from England could enter, this policy gave to the New England skippers the monopoly of their tobacco trade and proved a serious handicap to the province. A prime condition for the advance of North Carolina to social stability and prosperity was the securing of a port through which trade and intercourse could pass to and from Europe, and this she was now to obtain by the settlement of the region about Cape Fear.

¹ Hening, II, 445, III, 243.

The year 1715 may in general be taken as marking a turning point in North Carolina history. The cruel Tuscarora war had then been ended and that involved the destruction or subjugation of all the Indian tribes within the province east of the mountains. Thenceforward, so far as the natives were concerned, conditions were to be similar to what they had long been in the settled parts of Virginia—a few small groups of Indians continued to live submissively on reservations among the whites and the numbers of those steadily declined until the stock disappeared. The soil was thus opened for settlement with little further hindrance from the natives, and population began to extend toward the interior of the province. The northern province also found itself in a position to give some aid to its southern neighbor when she was in the agonies of the great Yemassee war, and by that event the soil was partly cleared for the settlement of Georgia and the middle portions of South Carolina. That also, as we have seen, contributed directly to the revolt which placed South Carolina under royal government and thus severed the last bond of connection which remained between it and the northern half of the original province. This, together with the loss of Georgia on the south and the advance of the settlements on the north, threatened for a time seriously to reduce the territory of South Carolina and made the fixing of her northern boundary a matter of pressing importance. Finally, with the end of Cary's rebellion which occurred at about the date of which we are speaking, formal uprisings in North Carolina ceased. The government was not again openly defied by any appreciable part of the population. Society was still very crude, government was weak, laws were few and poorly executed.

No more striking evidence exists of the primitive conditions of the time than that which shows the extent to which barter was used and the resort to staple products as medium of exchange. By a law of 1715 nineteen commodities were rated and declared to be tender in the payment of public and private dues, and to be operative both in dealings with outsiders and between colonists. In the list were included beef, pork, butter, cheese, pitch, feathers, wheat, leather, a variety of hides and skins, tallow and Indian corn, as well as tobacco.

Though efforts were made to banish this cumbersome device from the domain of taxation and revenue, they were on the whole unsuccessful. Governor Johnston wrote in 1749 that the system had continued to that time with very little change. It occasioned great and continuous loss to the revenue, for as between the different commodities, as well as different qualities of the same commodity, the poorest was always paid.¹ But North Carolina was never again to be so disorganized as it was during Cary's rebellion. More orderly relations were gradually established and with the growth of population, the extension of settlement and the increase of wealth and prosperity which characterized the period that was now beginning the province slowly emerged from its earlier weakness and chaos.

Among the tangible evidences that a period of greater regularity was approaching is the revision of the laws which were issued by the assembly at Little River in 1715.² In the spirit of the royal charter the laws of England, so far as they were applicable, including the body of the common law, were declared to be in force in the colony. The colonists also claimed the benefit of certain English statutes which did not mention the dominions, but were of fundamental importance as guaranties of liberty. Special precautions were taken against breaches of the peace and all words and acts in the province which tended in that direction. The parish system with vestries and church wardens was confirmed. The solemn affirmation of the Quaker was recognized as legal in all civil suits, but he was denied the right to give evidence in criminal trials, to serve on juries or to hold office. Following the example of the Fundamental Constitutions, this assembly passed an act for biennial elections and gave the suffrage to freemen of its respective precincts. Sessions were to be held in November of every year. Albemarle was the only region as yet fully organized and its four precincts were empowered to send five members each. The county of Bath, south of Albemarle Sound, was already in existence and the three precincts which were to form part of it, being as yet but sparsely settled, were given a representation of only two members each. Thus a distinction was established between the precincts of Albemarle and those further south which was long to continue and later to give rise to an important sectional issue. Bath, however, was created a town by this assembly and an effort was soon made to develop it into a port.

¹ N. C. Recs. IV, 920; XXIII, 54.

² Ibid., XXIII, 1-96; Ashe, History of N. C., I, 196, 198.

In a number of these laws the granting and settlement of land was regulated. The "great deed" of 1668 was declared to be the basis of the system, though deviations from its provisions were recognized as possible.¹ Every precinct was required to prepare a rent roll, to have a register of deeds and to keep a register of births, deaths and marriages. The fees of most officials were specified, the jurisdiction of the courts was defined and provision made for appeals. Indian relations received some attention and a militia law, which was later pronounced ineffective, was included. Provision was made for the building of fences, roads, mills, and for maintaining a pilot at Roanoke and Ocracoke inlet, for raising £2000 annually until the public debt should be paid and the outstanding bills of credit redeemed. A public treasurer was elected, Edward Moseley, who was speaker of the assembly, being chosen to this office. Christopher Bale and Tobias Knight were among the proprietors' deputies who at this time formed the council and these men, together with Governor Eden, may be considered as the leaders in this work of revision. It comprised, with some additions, what was regarded as of permanent value in the legislation of the proprietary period thus far, and it now became an important object of reference for the time to come.

The proprietors, when the acts were submitted to them, immediately objected to all interference by the assembly in the rents and sale of their lands.² They objected to receiving bills of credit and insisted on quit rents being paid in sterling. They also declared that sales of land should no longer occur in the province but only before their board in England. They would examine the entire body of acts and confirm such as they found suitable, but none should continue in force longer than two years unless they were confirmed by the proprietors. There is no evidence that they were confirmed and yet, with the exceptions which always obtained in such frontier communities, these laws remained in force, many of them for a long period of time.

¹ For the colonial view of this deed, its origin and object, as stated by one of Burrington's assemblies and also by himself, see N. C. Recs. III, 569, 601.

² N. C. Recs., II, 235, 250.

Nearly twenty years passed before the process of development to which reference has just been made reached a point where decisive results began to appear. Not until the administration of Gabriel Johnston do the records become sufficiently abundant to enable one to trace clearly such efforts as were made toward the improvement of conditions. In the interval which preceded three governors held office, of whose administrations some account will be attempted in this chapter. They were Charles Eden (1714-1722), Sir Richard Everard (1725-1731), and George Burrington. The last named had two administrations, the first as proprietary governor during the brief interval between Eden and Everard and the second as the first royal governor from 1731 to 1734. Toward the end of the second decade the province, with the exception of the proprietary eighth which was reserved by Carteret, was fully transferred to the crown.

As the flow of immigration into the colonies was now becoming considerable, it would have been expected that Bath county, which comprised the middle and southern parts of the eastern half of North Carolina, would have been settled. People did move slowly into it, especially along the Cape Fear river, and new precincts were formed. But the process was obstructed by the policy of the proprietors, who closed the land office in that county and for years forbade the sale of land there except for prices so high as to place it beyond the reach of most of the settlers. The payments also were required to be made at the office of the proprietors in London.¹ The governors, however, not without the knowledge of the proprietors, connived in some cases at violations of these rigid conditions, as low as 3d. per hundred acres being accepted for some grants. According to accounts which later were officially accepted as true, when the Virginia boundary had been settled, many blank patents for land were issued by the connivance of the governors and council. These patents were drawn up in form, signed and sealed, but the names of the grantees, the number of acres, the boundaries and sums paid were left blank, to be filled up later as the parties to these transactions saw fit. It was charged that Moseley and the other North Carolina commissioners who ran the Virginia line received their reward in lands granted after this fashion and profited largely in addition. The practice was kept up, chiefly among the governors by Sir Richard Everard, until the purchase by the crown in 1729 and even later. In this way speculative claims arose to several hundred thousand acres, and in many cases by purchase or otherwise many of these claims were transferred to other parties. When, after the establishment of the royal government, it became necessary to regulate titles, collect quit rents and introduce some degree of order into the land system of the province, blank patents became an important political issue and gave rise to much controversy both in the province and in England. It illustrated well the transition from proprietary conditions, where all sorts of irregularities, not to say fraud, were connived at, to the attempts at orderly administration which followed the transfer to the crown.¹

¹ N. C. Recs. IV, 296, 299, 318.

That relations during and after the assembly of 1715 were not quite harmonious is indicated by the action of the council, after the session closed, on certain resolves which purported to come from the other house. These were directed against the impressing of inhabitants or their property by the executive for alleged public services and without authority from the assembly, against some alleged unfair treatment of the Core Indians, and against those who were increasing the depreciation of the bills of credit by refusing to take them in payment of fees or quit rents. It was insisted that a representation should be made by members of the house to the proprietors on the deplorable condition of the province and on the necessity that they should continue to sell lands in both the Carolinas and receive bills of credit in payment therefor. The council protested against each of these resolves and declared that, as none of them had been communicated to it

¹ In another chapter the passage of South Carolina through this same phase of development is described.

during the session, they had been secretly passed and entered in the journal for the purpose of creating unreasonable jealousies and weakening the authority of government.¹

The scanty records of the time afford us only a glimpse of these differences between the two houses; and we know even less of the causes which induced Christopher Gale, the chief justice, to go to England in 1717 to complain against the governor.² Gale evidently did not succeed in his errand, for Eden was continued in his office and made a landgrave, while Gale remained out of the province for several years. In 1718 Eden's administration was smirched by its connection with the pirate Teach and his crew. Tobias Knight, secretary, member of the council and chief justice appears to have been in closest connection with them, for a part of their plunder was found on his premises. The destruction of Teach and the capture of his vessel, by the expedition which Governor Spotswood sent from Virginia, by its very thoroughness was the more humiliating to such pride as the Carolinians may have had in these matters. Thomas Pollock questioned the right of Spotswood to act as he did, and Spotswood patronizingly explained what he had done to Lord Carteret, the palatine. But however it might imply the inferiority of the backward proprietary province, the good work had been so thoroughly done that no one was inclined to protest.³ The death of Knight, which followed soon after the scandal had been aired, removed the person about whom contention chiefly gathered and helped to bring quiet.

But while the excitement was at its height, Edward Moseley and Maurice Moore, who were the natural leaders of the opposition in North Carolina, broke into the private house at Sandy Point where the secretary's office was kept and searched the records for criminating evidence against Knight and the governor. For this offence Eden sent a posse and had them arrested. Moseley, as was his wont, spoke out boldly, intimating that the governor was more interested in the arrest of peaceable citizens than of pirates. The two accused men were indicted for the great scandal and defamation against the governor. They were tried before the general court in October 1719. Light fines were imposed for breaking and entering the secretary's office, but Moseley for his seditious utterances concerning the governor was, by special verdict, found guilty and sentenced to a fine of £100 and to be incapable of holding office or place of trust in the colony for three years.¹ Jones, who was chief justice, stated to the council that, as Moseley had the largest practice of any lawyer in the province, many persons would suffer great hardships by being deprived of his services in cases where he had already held retainers. The force of this argument was appreciated by the council and Moseley was allowed to serve his clients in the cases for which he had pledged himself before sentence was passed upon him.

¹ N. C. Recs. II, 243, 244.

² Ibid., 284, 297.

³ Ibid., 319, 322, 325, 329, 333-340, 341-349.

While Moseley, who was probably the ablest man in the province and who certainly spoke and acted more boldly against what was regarded as official usurpation than did any other, was obeying the terms of his sentence, the revolution which brought proprietary government to an end in South Carolina occurred. The North Carolina settlements were so remote and their circumstances so different from those on the Ashley river that no corresponding movement among them occurred. Its effect, however, was to make proprietary control even more shadowy than it had previously been and to invite in England proposals to bring it completely to an end. But events drifted on and nothing was done. In the province itself assemblies met in 1720, 1722 and 1723, but of their proceedings, except a part of the meagre product of their legislation, no record has been preserved.² In 1722 Governor Eden died. Thomas Pollock and William Reed succeeded him for brief intervals in the capacity of president of the council.³ Christopher Gale had returned to North Carolina and was now serving again as chief justice, as well as the collector of the royal customs at Beaufort.

George Burrington arrived and assumed the office of governor as successor of Eden at the beginning of 1724. In some respects his character was like that of Francis Nicholson, though his career was much shorter and his activities were more devoted to the interests which were distinctly colonial. Like Nicholson, his activity was constant and in many respects it was directed to the best advantage of his province. He at once became interested in the Cape Fear region, then nominally included in Bath county, explored much of it in person and led in promoting its settlement. This was the most important forward step taken in this period of North Carolina history, for it not only secured a port for the colony but it opened up a large and valuable territory for farms and gave the colony a much needed extension toward the south. It was also an event of more than local importance, for it insured the filling with population of the wide and almost impassable tract which had separated the middle colonies from the settlements which were growing up in the remote south. A serious obstacle to communication between the colonies at large was thus gradually removed. Burrington was interested in the beginning of road building through North Carolina, in the exploration of the coast with a view to the improvement of navigation. In these interests he travelled widely and at much personal risk and discomfort. In all these respects the similarity between him and Nicholson is marked.

¹ Ibid., 321, 329, 351, 359, 364, 368, 379. Ashe, op. cit., 202, 204.

² N. C. Recs. II, 462., XXIII, 97-110.

³ Ibid., 449, 460.

As immigrants were seeking admission to North Carolina, the assembly at Edenton, in April 1724, desired the governor and council to issue such orders as would make it possible for settlers to take up lands, paying suitable rents therefor until the proprietors should declare the prices for which they would sell land and how the purchase money should be paid.¹ This they said was necessary in order to prevent immigrants from turning to other colonies. The governor and council accepted the suggestion and ordered that lands might be taken up on the annual payment of three shillings per hundred acres, and that when the proprietors should issue new conditions of settlement the titles thus secured should be accepted as valid. This order applied to Bath county, including the Cape Fear region, as lands in Albemarle county were considered by the colonists to be held under the "grand deed" of 1668. Like the appeal of the council of 1718, the object of these measures was to break through the restrictive policy which the proprietors had been following in reference to land in the interest of more rapid settlement, and Burrington, so far as we know, was heartily in their favor.

¹ N. C. Recs. II, 529.

But, as in the case of Nicholson, Burrington was often guilty of arbitrary acts and still oftener of the use of most abusive language. Both men were unable to control their tempers and both became involved in violent controversies with some of the leading men in their councils. In little more than six months after his arrival Burrington had quarreled with the naval officer and the collector of the customs at Roanoke, imprisoning one and publicly thrashing the other. He then undertook to discharge the duties of port officers himself. Because Chief Justice Gale had sustained these officers, Burrington assailed him not only with violent language but threatened extreme personal violence, even to the extent of laying him by the heels and burning his house at Edenton or blowing it up with gunpowder.¹ As Burrington had made so direct an attack on imperial officers, Gale went to England and laid his case before the treasury. Burrington's connection with Cape Fear and Maurice Moore, who was one of that prominent South Carolina family who had recently settled in that region, his friendly relations with Moseley and seeming tendency toward independence of the proprietors apparently furnished Gale with the ground for a charge that the governor was planning a revolt against proprietary rule like that which James Moore had just led in the southern province.² The result was that Burrington was immediately removed, his administration continuing in all only a year and a half.

Sir James Everard, the new appointee, was in no respect an improvement on Burrington, while there is no evidence that he devoted himself with special effect to the development of the province. Like Burrington, he early quarreled with the members of his council and throughout the last half of his administration their criticisms of him were most extreme.³ They reported to the home government that if they expressed opposition, though in the politest terms, to his unreasonable proposals in council, he would overwhelm them with threats and abuse and then fling himself out of the council room leaving business unfinished. Attempts of members to reason with him outside proved equally futile. Cooperation became impossible with him and, as was so often the case, paralysis of government set in accompanied by frequent arbitrary and illegal acts on the part of the executive. The councillors charged Everard with taking exorbitant fees in violation of the provisions of the law on the subject and with making the most arbitrary use of the courts of justice for the purpose of punishing his real or fancied enemies. Everard is charged with giving his ear to the petty quarrels of his wife and profligate son, and even of the children in the family, and in connection with these to have instituted a sort of inquisition to ascertain what gossip was floating about the community concerning himself and his relatives. The little town of Edenton was kept in a ferment by these doings and government was reduced to a farce.

¹ N. C. Recs. II, 561, 562, 577.

² Ashe, op. cit., 210; N. C. Recs. II, 577.

³ N. C. Recs. III, 2, 5, 25, 31; Ashe, op. cit., 212, 225.

At first Gale and his friends, Lovick and Little, the former enemies of Burrington, were Everard's trusted advisers. But he later broke with them and charged them and their misrepresentations of their rivals with responsibility for his own initial mistakes. They therefore became his bitterest enemies, as also did Edmund Porter, another prominent colonist. Burrington, too, remained in the province and actively interested himself in the election of Everard's first assembly. The ex-governor himself was chosen a member and his friends controlled the body, among them being Maurice Moore, Edmund Porter, John B. Ashe and others. By law the stated time for the meeting of this body was in November 1725, but on the advice of the council a proclamation was issued before it met proroguing it until the following April.¹

The assembly, however, came together on November 1. Maurice Moore was elected speaker.² They at once denied the power of the governor and council to prorogue them as they had done. Everard refused to recall his proclamation, acting doubtless chiefly under the advice of Gale. The house unanimously resolved that the prorogation was illegal and an infringement on their liberties and those of the people and that they would not proceed to business until their privileges were confirmed by the governor and council. But as the council did not recognize them as in session, their only resort was to address the proprietors. This address they prepared and sent by three agents, one being Edmund Porter. In it they highly praised Burrington and disowned the criticisms both of him and of the people of the province. They denied that the colonists were turbulent or that they desired to rise and throw off proprietary rule, as had been done in South Carolina. The chief cause of trouble they found in the misconduct of certain officials, the leading place among whom they would doubtless assign to Gale, who now held the office of chief justice and judge of admiralty.¹ The house now adjourned until April.

¹ N. C. Recs. II, 571.

² Ibid., 575 et seq.

Immediately Burrington began the most scurrilous attacks upon Everard calling him out of his house and abusing him, and later, in company with Cornelius Harnett, committing an assault upon the house and person of the constable.² Everard replied in kind with the result that Edenton was agitated for weeks by these riotous demonstrations. Even the ministers became involved.³ The records of the court, over which Gale presided and where these cases of riot were prosecuted, contain the only accounts which have come down to us of these occurrences. When the assembly met in April, in reply to a brief conciliatory speech of Everard, they poured forth a denunciation of alleged harsh proceedings of judges and juries against themselves and their friends.⁴ Approval of Burrington was again expressed and an address similar to the preceding one was sent to the proprietors. No laws were passed and little serious business was done. But though prosecutions were held over the head of Burrington, no effort was made to arrest or punish him nor could there be under such conditions. The feud gradually abated and in 1728 the cases against Burrington disappeared from ¹ The other leading offenders were John Lovick, the secretary, and William Little, the attorney general. Little was son-in-law of Gale.

² N. C. Recs. II, 648-653, 659, 666, 669, 170, 671, 687, 701, 705, 713, 823.

³ Ibid., 579, 604, 624; Ashe, I, 212.

⁴ N. C. Recs. II, 608 et seq.

the docket with an entry of noli prosequi. After a time he removed to the Cape Fear region, where he lived quietly until 1728.¹ In that year the northern boundary of the province was finally run and a question which had long been at issue with Virginia was settled.²

The time, too, had now come when the British government and the proprietors were able to agree upon terms for the surrender of the Carolinas to the crown. Proprietary government had never had more than a nominal existence in the northern province and there were no indications that it was becoming really more effective. For nearly thirty years past important restrictions had been imposed by the home government on the powers of the proprietors. The proprietors of Carolina had already confessed their impotence and the province was not a source of profit. On a moderate estimate quit rents were in arrears to the amount of £9500. For these reasons they were ready to sell and expressed themselves to that effect soon after the accession of George II.³

To the crown, even in Hanoverian times, the advantages of taking the Carolinas directly under its control were obvious.⁴ They were stated by Thomas Lowndes to the general effect that it would make the southern and western frontier more defensible against the Spanish and French; that the quit rents accruing from large stretches of good land would be made immediately available to the crown and by these, as well as in other ways, the royal revenue would be increased⁵; referring particularly to South Carolina, he also dwelt on the advantages which would come from a naval station at Port Royal. Other reasons might have been added, but it needed little persuasion on either side.

¹ Ashe, op. cit., 215.

² See chap. on Virginia in William Byrd, The Dividing Line.

³ N. C. Recs. II, 721; III, 6.

⁴ Ibid., 10.

⁵ Lowndes and Samuel Horsey are credited by some with having acted as agents for the proprietors at the time of the surrender. Both were landgraves and held or were candidates for office in South Carolina. Lowndes probably expressed his highest preference when, in a later communication to the board of trade, he suggested that North Carolina should be made a district of Virginia, for then its quit rents would be really collected and from a fund thus gathered a survey and charts might be made of the coast to the great advantage of trade; ibid., 49. On Lowndes see article in the Dict. of National Biography.

An agreement was reached between the crown and the parties who then held each of seven of the original proprietary shares for the sale of their respective holdings at £2800 each, making a total of £17,500. A lump sum of £5000 was to be paid for the surrender of all claims to arrears of quit rents and other public or semi-public dues to which the proprietors might be entitled. These payments should be made and the deed of surrender enrolled in the British Court of Chancery before September 29, 1729. As John Lord Carteret declined to surrender his share, the contract became effective for only seven of the original eight shares, and provision was made for laying off his one-eighth and his enjoyment of revenue and territorial rights over it much as was the case in the Northern Neck of Virginia. It should also be borne in mind that this surrender included the territory of South Carolina as well as of North Carolina, in other words of all which had been granted to the proprietors by the charter of 1665. This, of course, extended to the Florida boundary and included the territory which was soon to become the province of Georgia. The act, in other words, completed and gave full legal sanction to what had begun in South Carolina with the revolt of 1719. To give the contract the highest effect in law, it was embodied in an act of parliament which also was passed in 1729.¹ Until this time the terms barony and landgrave were occasionally used and the council was in part filled by deputies of the lords proprietors. But with the establishment of royal government the last traces even of the nomenclature of the Fundamental Orders disappeared.

Everard had held an assembly in 1727 and another in November 1729.² Each of these passed a few statutes, one of the most important being the act of 1729 providing for the issue of £40,000 in bills of credit, £10,000 of which were used in redeeming old bills and the rest was distributed among the precincts for circulation. As a result of the passage of this bill, he received a grant of £500. Notwithstanding the sale of the province the governor issued many grants of land, in some cases leaving the number of acres blank, to be filled in by the grantees, if they chose, in very large figures, and demanding no purchase money.¹ Lovick, Moseley and Little were said to have been concerned in these transactions. This shows, as was charged, that Everard had broken with Gale and had gone over to the popular leaders. Gale and his friends now exposed the alleged fraudulent grants of land and made such other complaints to the board of trade and secretary of state concerning Everard's conduct and loyalty in general as to make impossible his appointment as first royal governor.² Burrington, meantime, had gone to England and presented such a justification of his own career as governor as to make it appear that his previous removal by the proprietors was unjustifiable.³ The result was that Burrington was selected to be the first royal governor. This was presumably the work of Martin Bladen and Newcastle. Among his instructions an order was introduced that he should investigate the charges against Everard and his associates and, if he found them substantiated, institute prosecutions against them, making a full report of what he did to the authorities at home.⁴ Prominent among those whom he selected to be members of his council were Edmund Porter, John B. Ashe, Matthew Rowan and Cornelius Harnett, while Bladen selected for him William Smith, a young London barrister, to be chief justice, and Nathaniel Rice, Bladen's son-in-law, to be secretary. John Montgomery was later appointed attorney general.⁵

¹ N. C. Recs. III, 32.

² Ibid., 49; XXIII, 111-116.

Burrington did not arrive in the province until February 1731. During this interval of nearly two years after it was known that the crown had bought the province, government had been to a large extent suspended.⁶ The general court had not met, neither had some of the precinct courts or the legislature. The admiralty court, under Edmund Porter as judge, was charged with many arbitrary acts involving undue extension of its jurisdiction within the body

¹ N. C. Recs. III, 219, 222, 246, 273-4. In reply to later charges by Everard, Lovick was able to show to the satisfaction of the council that some of these grants or sales had been made to defray the cost of running the Virginia line and that they involved no fraud.

² N. C., Recs. III, 18, 49, 51, 61 et seq., 83, 90, 101.

³ Ibid., 28.

⁴ Ibid., 31, 62-65, 101.

Ibid., 85; Ashe, 226.

⁶ N. C. Recs. III, 142, 211 et seq.

of the counties and in disregard of prohibitions from the common law courts. Porter was also said to have used it as an instrument for the punishment of his friends, if not for his own enrichment. So indifferent was the home government to North Carolina that no provision was made for an interim government and a full year was allowed to pass between the decision to appoint Burrington and the drafting of his instructions. Naturally, on his arrival Burrington found the province in great disorder. He pronounced Everard utterly incompetent, a weak man who was drawn now in this direction and now in that as he fell in succession under the control of the leaders of the contending factions.¹

In April an assembly was called, of which Edward Moseley was chosen speaker.² Immediately the lower house came to an issue with the governor over his right to appoint their clerk. His appointee they ignored, but appointed the same person by their own authority. Of this conduct the board of trade disapproved and Burrington stated that he would insist on his right in this matter. In 1733 the assembly contended that the appointment of the clerk had always belonged to them and referred the matter to a committee to examine precedents. This committee of course reported in full accord with the sentiments of the house and failed to find that the proprietors or their officials had attempted to appoint the clerk, sergeant, messenger or doorkeeper.³ Here the matter rested until Johnston's administration, when the practice which came to obtain in the royal provinces generally, that the governor should appoint the clerk, was established in North Carolina.

In his speech at the opening of his first assembly, Burrington called their attention to a number of his instructions which contained some of the cardinal principles that the crown was always attempting to enforce. They were: that a permanent revenue should be granted; that excessive grants of land should not be made—not more than fifty acres for every individual in the family—and that grants which were not settled or on which quit rents were not paid should be declared forfeited; that all grants should be recorded in the office of the deputy auditor and that a copy of this list—which would form the basis of a rent roll—should be sent to England; that quit rents, fees and salaries should be paid in proclamation money, quit rents being not less than 4s. for every hundred acres¹; that a property qualification should be required for jury service; that the church and morality should be promoted and cruelty to servants, slaves and peaceful Indians restrained or punished. Burrington also urged that steps be taken to check the depreciation of the currency, to promote direct trade with Europe and the West Indies, that an agent be appointed to reside in England, that a town be built on Cape Fear river, that in every precinct wills be proved and licenses be granted, that the chief justice and assistants go on circuit. All these were subjects which the growth of the province and the establishment of royal government made necessary. But they were inconsistent with some of the provisions of the laws of 1715 and with many more practices which had long been in vogue in North Carolina. They proceeded also from a sovereign power outside the province which seemed much more likely to enforce its will than the proprietors had ever been. They were therefore sure to encounter opposition in the assembly which, taken in connection with the violence of speech that Burrington habitually used in defending himself and attacking his enemies, made harmony impossible.

¹ Ibid., 142, 155, 224–232, 333.

² Ibid., 257, 285 et seq.

³ Ibid., 288, 289, 354, 483, 576.

Fees, salaries and quit rents were closely connected as subjects of contention. The former had been fixed, at least for most officials, in one of the laws of 1715. But in Everard's administration even the council charged him with taking what fees he thought proper² and he seems to have continued the practice in spite of general protests against it. The requirement that fees should be paid in proclamation money now aroused general protest. Officials who obeyed this instruction were charged with taking fees four times in excess of the amounts to which they were entitled by the laws of 1715. The lower house held that, as English subjects, they should not be taxed or made liable to pay any sums or fees other than such as were by law established. They asked the council to join in a proclamation strictly prohibiting such practices. The council resented this as an assumption on the part of the assembly of the sole power of determining fees and denounced its proposal as an invasion of the prerogative.¹ Burrington proposed that fees be settled in the same manner as in Virginia. This, together with his remarks on the occasion, increased the irritation of the house and it proposed to pass new bills on the payment of rents as well as fees which should be in harmony with Carolina practice and, they believed, with the royal instructions. According to that instruction both the governor and council asserted that they had the right to determine the rates of fees and salaries. Two bills were passed by this house specifying various commodities in which payment could be made, in addition to bills of credit and proclamation money. But both were rejected by the governor on the ground that their effect would be greatly to reduce the amount of payments.² Charges and counter-charges upon the subject were exchanged between Burrington and the assembly until the close of his administration, the one affirming that fees were ruinously low, much lower than they were in other colonies, and the other affirming the contrary.³ The truth seems to have been that the officials in the main determined the rates of fees, but that the inferior or fluctuating character of the medium in which they were paid brought down the high nominal rates to low actual ones.

¹ Ibid., 95, 102.

² Ibid., 3.

In reference to quit rents and the possibility of having to pay them regularly and in proclamation money, with possible resurveys and disallowance of claims originating under blank patents, such feeling was aroused that the assembly of 1731 at once ordered the "great deed" of 1668 brought in and the original entrusted to the custody of the speaker while a copy was entered in the journal of the house.⁴ They declared that there was not enough specie in the province to pay one-twentieth of the quit rents and the salaries of officials. They objected to the payment of any salaries because the miserably

¹ Ibid., 95, 262, 264.

² Ibid., 143, 151, 157, 160, 265, 269, 270, 276, 279.

³ Ibid., 335, 482, 552, 591, 600, 607.

⁴ Osgood, Am. Colonies in the 17th century, II, 36. The quit rent prescribed in the "great deed" was about 2s. per hundred acres or one-half that which was required by the royal instruction.

small salary account of the proprietary period had been met from quit rents and sales of land. As to land grants, they asked that conditions of settlement be more easy and objected to the requirement that three acres in every fifty must be settled.¹ In the fee bill of this session the house inserted a provision for registering future grants of land in the auditor's office, but it also provided for the payment of these rents not only in proclamation money but in some eighteen commodities at specified rates. Its attitude toward the "great deed" also showed that they could not be easily brought to pay the rate stated in the governor's instruction. When for these reasons among others Johnston was forced to reject this bill, he repeatedly wrote to the board of trade about the impossibility he found in harmonizing his instruction upon quit rents with what the people firmly believed they were entitled to under the "great deed." This brought from the board the reply that the "great deed" could be understood only as a temporary letter of attorney from the proprietors, revocable at their pleasure and that it had been in effect revoked when they had directed Governor Eden to grant no land without reserving 1d. per acre. Moreover, the payment of 4s. proclamation money per hundred acres, as well as the payment of officer's fees in the same money, and the registering of all grants of land, were the terms upon which the crown had agreed to remit all arrears of quit rents, and if the people would not comply with these terms, orders soon might be expected for the collection of arrears. Burrington searched the records and made inquiries and was not able to find the alleged order to Eden to grant land at a penny per acre; neither could he find that any grants had ever been issued at that rent or at any rate higher than 2s. per hundred acres, the same as in Virginia. He also was impressed by the fact that the "great deed" had always been held to be as firm and valid a grant as the royal charter itself and in agreement with its terms all land in the northern part of the province was held. Therefore Burrington did not venture to make out patents on terms different from these and maintained an attitude toward the "great deed" which was essentially the same as that of the people. He also stated to the board of trade more than once how great an obstacle he found his instructions to be to the administration of territorial affairs.¹

¹ N. Car. Recs. III., 144 et seq., 292 et seq.

The attempt of Burrington, as royal governor, to enforce his instructions also brought up the question, of interest in so many provinces, of the appointment of the public treasurer or precinct treasurers. These governor's instructions required him to appoint and thereby to retain control over expenditures. The council supported him in his claim, while Burrington's opinion was that the practice of the choice of treasurers was, in idea, of New England origin. Besides the treasurer of the province, there were from time to time in North Carolina precinct treasurers, all of whom the assembly had come into the habit of choosing. Burrington searched the records in the effort to find how the office of treasurer came into existence in North Carolina, but was unable to find any statutory or other positive basis for it. Originally, as in other provinces, the receiver general had been the only finance officer. Then during the confusion of Cary's rebellion and the Indian war, when it first became necessary to issue bills of credit, treasurers, or public treasurers, were designated in the acts, to superintend the issue of the bills and the business of the loan office in general. That was the only power they had at first. Edward Moseley was prominently connected with this policy and the measures to which it gave rise and therefore he came to hold pretty continuously the office of public treasurer. As he was the leader of the popular group in the assembly and outside, it was against him first of all that Burrington and the council had to contend in all these related questions. In view of this record, Burrington of course claimed that a public treasurer, in the sense of receiver general or chief finance officer of the province and appointee of the assembly, did not legally exist in North Carolina. But Moseley was actually in such a position and claiming its powers, and it was very difficult, if not impossible, to oust him.² Burrington appointed Smith, the chief justice, to the office, but he withdrew before his commission was made out.

¹ Ibid., III, 150, 331, 337, 354, 479, 600, 608.

² Ibid., 151, 263, 265, 266, 335, 354, 483-487. Unfortunately in the new edition of the laws of North Carolina the acts which were disallowed and some others deemed of temporary importance have been omitted. The student is thus deprived, as in this case, of some most important proof material.

The assembly asserted that its claim was based on several statutes, especially one of 1729, which created a number of precinct treasurers, but they could not make out a clear case. Because the acts of 1729 had been passed after the purchase by the crown, Burrington considered them all of doubtful validity and as they contained many provisions which he thought inconsistent with the king's service, he insisted on sending home all the laws which were in force for inspection. It was decided that all acts which were passed before Everard had notice of the sale were valid, including the currency act, though it was probably passed after the news in question had reached Carolina. In 1733 the lower house designated two precinct treasurers and the upper house substituted another man in the place of one of these and this substitution was accepted by the lower house.¹ Thus the question was left at the end of Burrington's administration, no word having come from England.

In order to follow this subject to its conclusion, it should be stated that during the long governorship of Gabriel Johnston the question was settled in favor of the contention of the assembly. Early in 1735 the lower house nominated two persons for each of three vacancies in the office of precinct treasurer, the upper house made one change and the governor appointed one of the nominees to each place.² In November 1739 the governor and council appointed the chief justice public treasurer for the northern counties.³ In the following February an act was passed for appointing a public treasurer for certain counties, it being one of those on which, when the upper house was equally divided, William Smith, the president, who was also chief justice, voted a second time.⁴ In 1748 two treasurers were appointed by act of assembly, one for the northern counties and one for the southern counties — corresponding to similar arrangements for the east and west shores of Maryland — and thenceforward vacancies were filled in this manner.⁵

At the time when this controversy was in progress North Carolina had no forms of taxes except the poll or general

¹ Ibid., 546, 547, 580.

² N. C. Recs. IV, 106, 155.

³ Ibid., 354.

⁴ Ibid., 480; XXIII, 131.

⁵ Ibid., 273, 331 & 349.

property tax, of about five shillings per poll in currency, and the tonnage duty. Provision was made for both of these in the laws of 1715, tithables being defined so as to include free males sixteen years of age or over, and slaves of both sexes who were twelve years of age or over. By an act of 1723 free negroes were also made taxable, with the same age limitation as slaves. Lists were taken by the constables. The tonnage duty was one pound of powder, four pounds of swan shot, twelve flints or ten shillings of current money, for every three tons burden of vessels entering the province.¹ In 1723 a part of the revenue from this was appropriated for the improvement of navigation through the inlets and channels of the coast. But in 1731 Burrington wrote that the revenue from this source had been used chiefly in paying assemblymen and that navigation had been shamefully neglected. Not until 1734 was a small import duty levied on wines and liquors not imported from Great Britain. Objects of expenditure were few, the only permanent object of importance prior to the militia act of 1746 being payment for the services of councillors and assemblymen during sessions of the legislature. For war, erection of forts and public buildings there were almost no appropriations. Early in 1732 Burrington wrote to the board of trade, "It has been a Policy of the Subtle People of North Carolina never to raise any money but what is appropriated, to pretend and insist that no Publick money can, or ought to be paid, but by a Claim given to, and allowed by the House of Burgesses; insomuch that upon the greatest emergency there is no coming at any money to fitt out Vessells against a Pirate, to buy Arms, Purchase Ammunition, or any other urgent occasion. . . . The whole amount of the Publick Levys and Powder Money paid by shipping little exceeds two Hundred Pounds sterling a year."² Burrington was considering the establishment of a court of exchequer but had not yet reached the point where this seemed feasible.

Over the group of related questions which have just been discussed the quarrel between Burrington and his first assembly even became so violent that at the end of five weeks the session was brought to an end without anything being accomplished. The assembly was never called together again.¹ By favoring the establishment of a second town in the Cape Fear region — the later Wilmington — which would be a rival of Brunswick where the Moores from South Carolina had settled, Burrington alienated that family and its connections. Harnett's presence in the council Burrington pronounced a disgrace to it. He went to great length in denouncing the connection of Moseley and his friends with the alleged illegal granting of land. By members of the council in general the governor was criticised for the manner in which he conducted the inquiry into the charges against Everard. With Smith, the new chief justice, he came into hopeless relations over the position of assistants whom he was appointing to the supreme bench. At first Burrington held that these men had no judicial power whatever, and a few days later he completely reversed his position and declared that their share in determining the judgments of the court was equal to that of the chief justice. Both opinions were extreme and erroneous and they occasioned a violent quarrel, as a result of which Smith returned to England, threatening to procure Burrington's recall. These were some among the personal and political details which Burrington had to report to the board of trade at the close of his first year as royal governor.² Though the province was generally prosperous and increasing in wealth and population, it had no forts either inland or on the coast and was destitute of an organized or disciplined militia.

¹ N. C. Recs. XXIII, 45, 106, 154, 194.

² N. C. Recs., III, 336.

Soon after the close of the first year of Burrington's administration complaints against him began to reach the home government. During the two succeeding years complaints, defences and counter-complaints were drawn and filed before the board of trade in large numbers and dealing with every feature of the dispute. Some phases of the controversy were aired before the council of North Carolina. Smith, Porter, Ashe, Moseley and other councillors whom Burrington had attacked presented many long statements and affidavits showing the violence and arbitrariness of his conduct toward them.³

¹ Ibid., 415.

² Ibid., 235, 244, 310, 322, 331-339, 415; Ashe, op. cit., 232.

³ N. C. Recs., III, 375-391, 405-414, 439-535.

On one occasion, when Moseley was defending Porter before the court and because he had not received a license from Burrington to practice as an attorney, though he had a license of a much earlier date, the governor in a great rage ordered his arrest and imprisonment. On a later occasion he had Moseley imprisoned again on an equally frivolous charge, and because his new appointee to the chief justiceship would not yield to his arbitrary will, he was forced out of office and William Little was appointed as his successor. A violent private quarrel over property, which Burrington apparently provoked, led to the arrest of Ashe and the placing him under heavy bonds, intended, it was alleged, to prevent him from going to England to present charges against the governor.

The controversy, as it developed, produced one valuable result. It occasioned the preparing of a number of papers which throw light on obscure points in earlier North Carolina history. By the one side or the other, the nature and binding force of the "great deed" was discussed,¹ the origin of the office of treasurer and its connection with the early issues of bills of credit,² and the methods followed in the issue of warrants for the taking up of land, together with the size of grants. The question of the right of the executive alone to erect precincts and endow them with the right to send representatives to the assembly was also debated at length.³ Relying on the Fundamental Constitutions and early practice, Burrington argued that the governor and council had this right and they had erected several precincts in Bath county in this manner. He contended that earlier assemblies by accepting representatives which had been elected in precincts thus created had recognized that form of origin as legal. As to his royal instructions they were silent on this subject, and Burrington declined to be bound by instructions to other provinces or their practice. On the other side it was argued that this practice gave to the upper house control over the whole legislature by enabling it to fix the number of the lower house and to determine the bounds of precincts. They declared the procedure illegal and cited the practice in Virginia and later practice in North Carolina in justification of their claims. They sought also, though wrongly, to bring the instruction which forbade the governor to erect new courts of justice to bear on this question. The truth of the case was that the right claimed by Burrington was an incident of his territorial power and was exercised as such in the early years of the province; but as the legislature and political consciousness behind it became more developed it had to be abandoned and matters of such importance it became necessary to regulate by statute. Among the royal provinces this may be said to have become the universal practice.

¹ Ibid., 480.

² Ibid., 466, 484-490.

³ Ibid., 439, 442, 450 et seq.

Burrington's second assembly met at the beginning of July, 1733 — Moseley being again speaker — and continued in session a little more than two weeks, when the governor dissolved it.¹ The reason for this was that agreement between himself and the lower house on any of the questions which had formerly been in dispute was found to be impossible. Burrington had delayed calling the assembly until he had received a reply to his report to the board of trade on the payment of fees and quit rents. The board had adhered to its former requirements — that they should be paid in proclamation money. The assembly on its part continued to insist that they might be paid in currency or in kind, that is, in the current money of the province, and that there was by no means enough gold or silver in the province to meet this demand. The tenure of land in Albemarle county and the amount of quit rents which was due there were closely connected with this, and again the house refused to admit that the "great deed" was revocable. The council, being small in number and those mostly the governor's beneficiaries for the time being, had nothing significant to say. The questions just referred to were again discussed at length in messages which passed between the governor and the assembly, without anything new being brought forward. The proceedings were marred by ill temper on both sides. Burrington told the house that its reply to his opening speech was drawn by his most inveterate opponent among their number, Edmund Porter, and was pushed through with a noise and violence which stifled all opposition.¹ Among other things it contained a charge of perverting justice and taking exorbitant fees, against Little, the chief justice. This drew from Little a defence and plea for a hearing in which his reputation might be cleared from this grave charge. This Burrington ordered to be held before the council after the close of the session. Smith, who was soon to succeed as chief justice, was also involved in these charges, preferred in this case by the governor. The assembly ordered Little's arrest and sent a very severe communication to the governor,² in which they charged that parties whom he had injured or opposed had no relief before the courts, that the laws were disregarded, justice in a manner stopped and oppression and arbitrary power had almost overrun the province. When he received this, Burrington called the assembly before him and dissolved it.

¹ N. C. Recs. III, 540-611.

For about a year Burrington now nominally governed the province without an assembly or even a council. During the time he suffered a long and dangerous illness and Nathaniel Rice, the senior councillor, was sworn in as president. Some of the councillors had died and with most or all of the others Burrington became involved in bitter quarrels. Smith, Rice and Montgomery finally tried to assassinate Burrington³ and later, to escape arrest, fled to Virginia, where they remained until after the arrival of Johnston. One other assembly met just before his arrival, but it did nothing of importance.⁴

Notwithstanding Burrington's merits, the accumulation of evidence as to his oppressive and arbitrary conduct, most or all of which was laid before the board of trade,⁵ was such as to make his recall a necessity. One thing which made it inevitable was a left-handed reflection in one of his letters on Martin Bladen, implying that he was planning the governor's recall in order to make room for one of his relatives.⁶ So thorny did Burrington find his path to be, without salary and involved in endless broils, that finally he begged to be relieved of office and allowed to return to England. He wrote that he had been compelled to sell not only his household

¹ Ibid., 560, 567.

² Ibid., 606-609.

³ Ibid., IV, 165; Ashe, op. cit., 240.

⁴ N. C. Recs. III, 612 et seq.

⁵ Ibid., 631.

⁶ Ibid., 344, 370; Ashe, op. cit., 235 goods, but even his linens, plate and books, and to mortgage his land and stock, while his constitution had been impaired by many sicknesses.¹ Burrington had steadfastly and often ably upheld the policy of the home government, but he had not succeeded in moving the assembly or the province from its traditional attitude in any essential particular. By temperament and by his recent experiences he was too deeply involved in the internal feuds of the province successfully to mediate between it and the crown. Another long administration was needed to bring North Carolina even measurably into line with British principles of government.

¹ N. C. Recs. III, 625.

CHAPTER IV

NEW YORK AND NEW JERSEY BETWEEN 1716 AND 1730

THIS was a period of comparative quiet, which intervened between the conflicts that had their origin in the Revolution of 1689 and in the misgovernment which had accompanied the first two intercolonial wars and the disturbances of the Cosby, Clark and Clinton régime. It also coincided with the first half of the period of peace, during which conditions were preparing for the decisive stage of the struggle between England and France for the possession of North America.

So far as the politics of New York itself were concerned, relations during this period continued very much as they had been determined to be in the settlement of 1715 between Hunter and the assembly. Hunter continued to hold the office of governor for four years after harmonious relations between himself and the assembly had been established. In 1716 an assembly was elected, to which an entirely new list of members was returned from New York county. A few changes of no political significance occurred in the representation from other counties. The fact that Mulford was returned from Suffolk showed that the spirit of opposition in extreme form still existed there. Livingston Manor now sent a representative for the first time and Robert Livingston was naturally its first choice. We know from a letter of Hunter that there was a spirited contest in New York city and county, from which the governor was fortunate enough to emerge victorious. The former members who were dropped — Jacobus Van Cortlandt, Stephen DeLancey, Samuel Bayard and John Read — were determined opponents of the settlement which had been reached between the executive and the assembly and would even now have overthrown it if they could.¹ A merchant named Baker was supposed to be laboring in their employ in England to procure the disallowance of the acts. David ¹ N. Y. Docs. V, 514; Ass. J. I, 367, 381.

Provoost, Johannes Jansen, Jacobus Kipp and Garret Van Horne, the newly elected members, Hunter counted on for steady support of his policy.

During the last two years of Hunter's administration some interesting financial discussions were occasioned by objections which were raised on the part of the home government against the revenue act of July, 1715, and the tonnage duty act of September, 1716.¹ The clauses to which objection was made were those which involved the possible taxation of the trade and shipping of the United Kingdom. In the first mentioned act wine was taxed twice as heavily when it came from places other than those of its production as it was when it came direct from the place where it was produced. In the other act a similar difference was made in the rate of duty levied on negroes, when they were brought in New York vessels, as compared with the rate imposed when they came in other vessels directly from Africa. Hunter met the criticism with the statement, in the one case, that no wine had ever been imported from Great Britain, or in all probability ever would be, and in the other case that he had never heard of any negroes being imported directly from Africa in vessels belonging to Great Britain. What the assembly were really aiming at was the encouragement of New York shipping and the discouragement of the importation of "refuse and sickly negroes here from other colonies." The repeal of the revenue act, the governor also said, might ruin the province. The board of trade therefore returned it for amendment and stated that, if it was not amended, it would be disallowed. An additional instruction² was sent to the effect that, besides earlier orders prohibiting the acceptance by governors of bills affecting the royal prerogative or property without first submitting a draft of the same to the king, and forbidding the passage of any law of unusual or extraordinary character without the insertion in each case of a clause suspending its execution till the pleasure of the king could be known, it was his majesty's further will that no act should hereafter be passed which affected the trade or shipping of the United Kingdom without a clause stating that it should not go into effect until approved by the monarch.

¹ Col. Laws, I, 847, 898; N. Y. Docs. V, 501, 509.

² Ass. J. I, 419.

When this action of the crown came before the assembly, an elaborate address was presented by it to the governor, in which its views on the financial condition and policy of New York since the time of Cornbury were set forth.¹ The immediate bearing of this on the question in hand appears in these two points. In the first place, the assembly showed that, owing to the dishonest waste of revenue by former governors, the levy of imposts on trade had been wholly abandoned in New York, and the only source that was left from which to support the government and pay the cost of the two futile expeditions which had been planned against Canada, near the close of the late war, was the inadequate land tax. Prejudice against the impost had become so strong that the attempt to revive it seemed vain, while the opposition which the merchants were now making against its revival clearly revealed their attitude. In the second place, both the assembly and Hunter referred to the fact that by earlier tonnage acts, passed not only in New York but in Virginia and other colonies, this form of duty had been imposed on British shipping, while an incidental purpose of the law under discussion was to encourage shipbuilding in New York. In view of these considerations and of the great advantages which had come from the fiscal acts of 1715 and succeeding years, it seemed clear to the New York authorities that the peril involved to the interests of Great Britain was insignificant when compared with the benefits which would come from these measures. But the crown did not swerve from the principle which it laid down in the additional instruction, and by an explanatory act passed in 1718 language was used which made it clear that, in the duties on liquors and slaves and in tonnage duties, there was no intention of discriminating against the inhabitants of Great Britain.²

For some time after Hunter's return to England — in the summer of 1719 — he acted virtually as agent of the province for the purpose of explaining and defending the measures of his administration and checking thereby the efforts of his critics. He repeatedly appeared before the board of trade and gave information and advice concerning the finances of

¹ Ibid., 421 et seq.

² Col Laws, I. 1010 et seq.; N. Y. Docs. V. 519.

New York, quit rents, Indian relations and the condition of the province in general.¹ At this time the treasury board was considering the encroachments of the assembly on the executive in New York in the management of finance.² This discussion drew from Horatio Walpole, who was auditor general of the plantations, a memorial on these encroachments as related to the position of the treasurer and the audit of accounts. Soon after Walpole's accession to his office in 1717, he had ordered his deputy in New York to require from De Peyster, the treasurer, an account of the revenue and its disposition. De Peyster replied that he was accountable to the governor, council, and assembly of the province. This reply he made on several occasions, though it directly contradicted the thirtieth instruction to the governor, which required him to see that no clause should be inserted in any appropriation act whereby accountability to the treasury in England was prevented. Finally it was learned that the assembly had passed a resolution prohibiting the treasurer from accounting to any but the governor, council and itself. Hunter, when questioned upon the subject,³ confirmed what Walpole had stated, but had no remedy to suggest. Only the quit rents, he said, and such slight revenue as might arise under acts of parliament, now came into the hands of the receiver general, and in view of the insignificance of the office in its present condition it is no wonder that Hunter was unable to secure a salary for its incumbent.

During the fourteen months which intervened between the departure of Hunter from New York and the arrival of William Burnet, his successor, the affairs of the province were administered by Schuyler and the council. One of Schuyler's acts which aroused the fears of Hunter and his friends was the appointment of Jacobus Van Cortlandt as mayor of New York and of Myndert Schuyler as mayor of Albany, both of whom had been identified with the opposition to Hunter. Some other significant changes seem also to have been made, and they together gave rise to the suspicion that Schuyler intended to dissolve the existing assembly and institute a general change both of men and measures.¹ So unusual would this have been in an interim government, and to such an extent did it worry Hunter, that he urged Craggs, the secretary of state, to write to Schuyler to make no changes except what he himself should advise as absolutely necessary. The board of trade supported this recommendation and such a letter was sent and duly received. It was at this time that William Burnet, son of the famous bishop of Salisbury, was appointed governor of New York. Francis Harison and Dr. John Johnstone were also appointed members of the council, and Cadwallader Colden surveyor general, all of whom were friendly to Hunter and his policies. Schuyler, in a letter to the board of trade, denied that he had sought changes but rather had adhered to former lines of policy with unusual care, though he had to admit that he had appointed his son-in-law mayor of Albany.

¹ N. Y. Docs. V. 540, 548, 551 et seq.

² Ibid., 527, 545 et seq.

³ Ibid., 559.

The relations between Hunter's last assembly and the executive had been so friendly that orders were sent to Schuyler from England not to dissolve it. Hence this body met Burnet on his accession to office and was continued in existence by successive prorogations until 1726. This result, however, was not reached without opposition. Burnet, a man presumably of sanguine temperament and certainly desirous of an active and beneficent administration, came to New York with his mind full of ideas which he had received from Hunter in England. To the assembly he spoke of Hunter as "my incomparable predecessor," and praised it for having been concerned in "those great measures" by which the peace and credit of New York had been established by methods similar to those which had recently been followed in England.² He flattered himself that his task would be much easier than Hunter's had been at his first coming. That indeed it was, but he found that Schuyler, and his chief adviser Philipse, together with three or four other members of the council, favored a new assembly.³ Burnet found that there were precedents in favor of continuing an assembly from one administration to another, and believed that it would be considered legal in England. He privately met the members who raised scruples against it and told them to consider well whether, for reasons the validity of which they could not affirm, they would be justified in blocking supplies for at least nine months to come and neglecting an immediate remedy for the disaffection of the Indians, which was due to the encroachment of the French and to the decay of the forts. The new governor's attitude toward them was so determined that Schuyler and four others desired leave to go into the country, "which I granted them." He then recommended to the board of trade the removal of Schuyler and Philipse from the council and the appointment of Colden and James Alexander in their places. For this action he gave various reasons connected with their opposition to Hunter and the making of some questionable grants of land. Burnet desired that the removals should come from England rather than in the form of suspensions by himself, in order to avoid bitter feelings. In June, 1722, in answer to ten letters from Burnet, ranging in dates from November, 1720, to March, 1722, the board of trade informed him that Schuyler and Philipse had been removed and Colden and Alexander appointed.¹ The opposition did not extend beyond the council, and even there it was of slight importance, for its personnel was rapidly changing during these years and the way was preparing for a new adjustment in New York politics.

¹ N. Y. Docs. V. 534, 535, 537; Col. Ex. C. Min. 275.

² Ass. J. I, 439.

³ N. Y. Docs. V, 574, 578 et seq., 583. The long duration of Irish parliaments was cited as a precedent.

At the outset relations between the new governor and the assembly were most harmonious. The address in reply to Burnet's cordial greeting was written by Morris and promised ample support for five years to come. They would also provide for any necessary deficiency and would carry out the policy which Burnet recommended, so far as time, the nature of the thing and the circumstances of the province would permit. The address was presented by the whole house, and in view of the special relations which then existed, it was more than ordinarily significant. A few days before it was agreed to, Captain Mulford had virtually charged this assembly with having plunged the province into debt to the amount of £35,000. When the address was being signed, he objected to the legality of the house. With this the patience of the assembly toward Mulford became utterly exhausted, and he was a second time expelled. William Nicoll, long a leader of the opposition and speaker, also retired at this time on the plea of ill health.¹ With these retirements discordant voices for the time were silenced and general harmony prevailed. In this its fall session of 1720 a supply for five years was voted and in the form of specific resolutions appropriations were made, the list starting off with the sum of £1560 per year for the governor. An impost, a tonnage duty and a license tax on the distilling and sale of liquors were the sources of revenue provided for in the act, and bills of credit were to be issued to be redeemed by the yield from these taxes.²

¹ Ibid., 647.

In the policy of Burnet Indian relations occupied a more prominent place than they had done in any administration since that of Bellomont. This was due to the fact that peace left time and leisure in which to consider the rapid advance which the French were making along the Great Lakes and in the Mississippi valley. To this, from the first, Burnet was fully alive and urged the repair of forts and the building of new ones, and a more strict regulation of trade in Indian goods. This led, in the first place, to the passage of an act imposing a 2% duty on all European goods imported into the province, the revenue from which should be specially expended in the building of forts in the Indian country. To meet the objection of the home government to legislation of this kind, a suspending clause was inserted in the act, and the governor wrote that the assembly could not be brought to adopt any other expedient for the purpose except the one embodied in this law.³ He also added a brief review of precedents from New York history, between 1691 and 1702, for the imposing of a duty of this kind, and added that he knew of no reason for the discontinuance of such legislation, except the revulsion against imposts of all sorts which had been occasioned by the fiscal irregularities of Cornbury's

¹ Ass. J. I, 440, 442-445; C. J. I, 452.

² Ass. J. I, 448; Laws, II, 16 et seq. From C. J. I, 454, 460, it appears that Byerly, the receiver general, protested against the extending of control over this revenue to the treasurer and withdrew when the general support bill was passed.

³ Laws, II, 32; N. Y. Docs. V, 576, 581, 641, 643, 648, 706.

administration. The act, however, was strongly opposed by the merchants in England and though the board of trade, because of the use to which the revenue from it was to be put, recommended that it should be approved, it was finally disallowed in 1724. In the course of his correspondence on the subject, Burnet called attention to the low rate of the duty, a rate which could easily be borne, because the profits on coarse goods imported from Bristol were from 30% to 40% and on fine goods from London from 20% to 30%. The continuance of the beaver trade, he also argued, was dependent on defence and the object of the act was to procure means for building forts, an object which ought to appeal to the merchants. But his arguments did not weigh strongly against the representations of the merchants, and in the order of council for the repeal of the act, the board of trade was required to draft an instruction to all the governors requiring them not to assent in the future to any act laying a duty on European goods imported into the colonies in English vessels.

Another feature of Burnet's policy which he considered of great importance was embodied in an act of this session which strictly prohibited the sale of strouds, duffels and other Indian goods to the French.¹ This law was strengthened by the passage, two years later, of another more detailed act on the same subject, and the two were continued in force till 1726. Merchants of Albany and to an extent throughout the province had become greatly interested in the sale of these goods to the French.² They were produced chiefly or wholly in England, and could be delivered to the French at prices lower than those for which they could import them directly from Europe. The French sold the goods to the Indians and this helped them to monopolize the Indian trade and thus to strengthen their influence with the tribes far and wide. The Five Nations themselves called attention to this tendency. Burnet and his advisers, so far as they were not personally interested, clearly saw the danger of this trade to English interests and sought to prevent it. By means of this legislation the governor sought to induce the far Indians, as well as the Iroquois, to come to Albany, instead of Montreal and Quebec, for their supplies and for the sale of their furs. It was enacted that no one within New York should directly or indirectly trade with any French subject in such commodities on penalty of forfeiture of the goods and heavy fine. An east and west line drawn through the northern limits of Albany marked the boundary beyond which, if such goods were found, they and their owners should be subject to the penalties of the act. Veritable writs of assistance might be used for their seizure. But the officials upon whom the government must depend for the execution of the law were the sheriffs and the justices who, as usual, fully shared local feeling, or were themselves interested in the trade they were required to suppress. The Indian commissioners at Albany and the Dutch in the northern sections of the province were more or less persistently opposed to the measure. However broad and statesmanlike may have been the view of the governor, the instinct of gain, which so generally manifested itself even in time of war, was too strong for him. In the fall of 1721 Burnet told the council that the act had been evaded and it would be necessary to station an officer and twenty men at Saratoga, that being the place where much of the clandestine trade centered. In the effort to enforce this policy the tendency to establish posts further on in the Indian country was strengthened. Soldiers were now employed in the enforcement of the act, and that gave rise to the special complaint that civil rights were being violated.

¹ Laws, II, 8, 98, 197, 248.

² Cadwallader Colden was a supporter of Burnet's policy in this matter and the government's view of the case was stated in his report on the trade of New York. N. Y. Docs. V, 687.

British and New York merchants appeared in force against Burnet's policy.¹ They declared that it was proving a blow to British trade and that, in consequence of it, the importation of beaver into England was falling off. It was also not a hindrance to the French, they declared, for they could supply themselves with the commodities in question from other colonies or from Europe. Gross misrepresentations of the geography of the region were made in support of these arguments. In a memorial to the king the board of trade, in July, 1724, suggested that no action be taken on the laws until Burnet had been informed of the objections of the merchants and his answers to these had been received. This course was followed, and on the arrival in New York of this notification of the government's action, all available material in support of the laws, including Colden's report and a report of the committee of the council, was printed and circulated in pamphlet form.¹ Peter Leheup, who was then agent of New York in England, was given full information to be used in support of the laws in England. The merchants employed Mr. Sharpe as counsel to present their case. Formal hearings were held by the board of trade in May, 1725.² As was usual in such cases, the evidence presented was incomplete and often contradictory. The merchants presented no proof of their statement that the French manufactured all the strouds which were needed for their trade, though upon that question depended much of the strength of their argument. Of still greater importance were statistics of the export of furs from the port of New York and of their importation into Great Britain since the passage of the laws, as compared with years immediately preceding that date.³ There were indications of a slight and temporary diminution and also of a slight increase of price. But the interval since the passage of the laws was too short to justify any conclusion; in 1722 beaver had been made an enumerated commodity, and the effect of this on the considerable quantities of furs which had been exported to foreign countries could not yet be known. At the close of the series of hearings Hunter, the ex-governor, was called in and gave his voice strongly in support of the acts. But in the absence of conclusive evidence for either side, the board of trade contented itself with criticising the severity of the oaths and penalties imposed by the acts, and recommended that a new act should be passed for the further development of the avenues of trade which were opening with the Indians, and which should be free from the objections to which the present acts were liable.

¹ N. Y. Docs. V, 708; Ex. C. Min. Sept., 1721, Oct., 1725.

¹ N. Y. Docs. V, 760.

² Ibid., 745 et seq., 760-763.

³ The reports sent from the New York custom house relating to this trade continued to differ from the accounts at the London custom house, suggesting that the New York reports gave only the numbers of casks or other packages, without reference to the number and value of the skins which they contained. This Burnet finally confessed to be the fact, though it invalidated his claim that under the new laws the export of furs from New York had decidedly increased. N. Y. Docs. V, 779-781, 811.

By 1726 Burnet himself had become convinced that, under the provisions of the existing laws, it was impossible to prevent wholesale evasions.¹ Therefore a detailed act was passed in which the oaths and fines and absolute prohibitions of the previous statutes were dropped and for them was substituted a duty on the trade in Indian goods both to the north and to the west, but the rates charged on the trade to the north, i.e., to Canada, were double those imposed on the direct trade with the Indians to the westward. The collection of these duties was farmed out at Albany.

The establishment of the post at Oswego, in which culminated the policy of Burnet towards the Indians and French, furnished an added occasion for continuing the fines and other sources of revenue connected with the restriction of trade with Canada. These were used as a part of the revenue for the support of Oswego. In two elaborate acts, passed in 1727 and 1728, these two lines of policy were combined and made to contribute to one another, a special board of commissioners being created for their execution.²

Meantime in England the merchants continued their attacks on the policy of restricting trade with Canada, and it was represented that the fur trade was suffering greatly thereby. In November, 1729, the board of trade submitted a report on the whole series of six acts which had been passed at that time, approving in general the policy of prohibiting trade with Canada and promoting direct trade with the Indians, but taking exception to several of their administrative provisions.³ It therefore thought they all should be repealed. This advice was acted on by an order in council of December 11, 1729, against which the assembly of New York filed a long protest a year later.⁴ But this was futile, and though Oswego stood, Burnet's policy of restricting trade with Canada failed.

While the subject of trade with Canada was in the foreground Abraham De Peyster, the elder, who had so long been treasurer of the province, became incapacitated for business and his son, of the same name, was appointed to succeed him, June 2, 1721.⁵ A search through the journal of the house

¹ Ibid., 781; Col. Laws, II, et seq.

² Ibid., 372, 484.

³ N. Y. Docs. V, 897 et seq.

⁴ Ass. J. I. 607, 621.

⁵ Ass. J. I. 452.

failed to bring to light any evidence that the late treasurer had given security for the due execution of his office and the custody of the revenue, or that he had been required to do so except by one appropriation act of the fifth of Anne, which provided that he should account to the governor, council and assembly for the money raised under that law in such manner as should be approved by William Nicoll, the speaker.¹ His successor was now required to give security to the amount of £5000 that he would perform his duties to the satisfaction of the assembly.² At this time also the question of accounting to the auditor general through his deputy, for the entire revenue of the province, came up again for discussion. George Clarke, who was afterward lieutenant governor, at that time held the office of deputy auditor. An elaborate memorial was presented³ by the assembly to the governor, in which the claim of the auditor general was discussed from the New York point of view. The emphasis was, of course, laid on its cost to the province and its uselessness. As to its cost, they argued that express provision for Blathwayt's salary had been made in his commission and it was to come from the West Indies and Virginia. The £500, as provided for, they claimed, was deemed a sufficient reward, and nothing whatever was said about an allowance from New York or other provinces. The auditor general therefore had extended his power when, without authority under the great seal, he had exacted a perquisite of 5% of the entire revenue audited by him. As the revenue of New York averaged about £4000 a year, this payment was about £200. It had originated in the corrupt days of Fletcher and Cornbury and the assembly suspected that it had been pocketed in the province and no account of it sent to England. In 1704 Blathwayt, they said, had declined the 5% as too large, and accepted a stated sum of £150 a year for himself and deputy. It was to avoid a payment to the auditor general in any form that the treasurer had ceased to account to him. But he was and had been ready to account with the governor, through whom statements of revenue and expenditure could as readily reach the British treasury. There was no intent to cast contempt on the authority of the crown or to withhold from his majesty the state of their revenue; but if so much had to be spent for auditing, arrears and salaries would have to go unpaid, and it was hoped that the governor would induce the lord treasurer to forego the demand.

¹ Ibid., 467, 468.

² Ibid., 454, 467, 468.

³ Ibid., 459 et seq. See Chapter I of Part I of the present work.

In the summer session of 1722, while the assembly was still at work upon the accounts of the late treasurer, it was informed by his widow that suits against the De Peyster estate had been begun, on behalf of the king, to force an accounting.¹ After consideration of this in committee of the whole, the house resolved that the accounts in question, up to June 1, 1721, had been audited by a joint committee of the council and assembly and satisfactory reports made thereon to the two houses, and that the crown might appoint an official to receive these accounts, but for this he should receive no perquisites, from either the treasurer or the colony. It was also resolved that such accounting as should be made through the deputy auditor must be from the books as they had been kept and in their forms, and the assembly would see that the treasurer's family should incur no excuses thereby or from any suits which might be brought against them. In accordance with a letter from the treasury, in August, 1720, moneys for the regular support of civil government only should be accounted for and, as the assembly inferred, not the many extraordinary levies which were appropriated for specific uses and without allowance for the auditor.

By this time the rights of the auditor general had become an important political question.² Clarke, the deputy auditor, was insistent upon his claims and those of his chief, while the newly elected members of the assembly proved to be strong supporters of the late treasurer's interest. The governor refused to concur in their votes to protect the De Peysters and felt that he had lost credit thereby. But he would not dissolve the assembly, as Clarke advised, for then a revenue would have been voted for only two years instead of five and it would have been reduced in amount. But, in 1723 and thereafter, the governor succeeded in obtaining a yearly accounting to the deputy auditor of the current revenue, and also of arrears since 1715, and the payment of the 5% perquisite for this.

¹ Ass. J. I, 481.

² N. Y. Docs, V, 765.

With the fall session of 1725 the aged Robert Livingston, the speaker, because of illness failed to appear, and Adolph Philipse was chosen in his place.¹ This was one of several indications that a shifting of sentiment was in progress in the assembly. At about the same time the governor became involved in unpleasant relations with Stephen DeLancey,² one of the leading merchants and an opponent of the acts which forbade trade in Indian goods with Canada. Some personal differences also had arisen between the two over a quarrel in the French church. When, in 1725, DeLancey was returned to the assembly, as he had been to nearly every one for twenty years, and appeared to take the oaths, Burnet unwisely asked him how he became a subject of the crown. DeLancey replied that he was denizenized in England. Burnet, being doubtful whether that was a sufficient qualification, said he would consider the question before he administered the oaths. DeLancey then produced before the house an act of a notary public certifying that he was made a subject in England and was entitled to all the privileges that went therewith: a letter of denization under the seal of New York and dated in 1686; a certificate that he had taken the oath of allegiance in 1687 as directed by the law of 1683; and a certificate of his having sat regularly in assemblies since 1702. The governor had meantime consulted Chief Justice Morris, who was also a member of the assembly, and he had rendered an opinion that DeLancey must produce a patent of denization in England or proof of its enrollment, and that one could not be naturalized in the province without an act of the legislature. But, owing to the possibility that in 1686-7 ordinances in New York had the force of laws and to the fact that for forty years the naturalization of DeLancey had been accepted as valid, Morris declined to give an opinion to the effect that his claim to a seat in the assembly was not also valid. The governor then referred the case, with Morris' opinion, to the house, and it unanimously decided that DeLancey was duly returned and qualified. Though this procedure led to no sharp resolves, it caused much irritation and increased hostile feelings toward Burnet among the merchants. It inclined many to an unfriendly attitude when the question of voting support for the next five years was before the assembly.

¹ Ass. J. I, 513 et seq.; N. Y. Docs. V, 768 et seq. George Clarke to Walpole on the political situation in New York.

² Ass. J. I. 514-520; Smith, History of New York, I, 230 et seq.

Burnet had enjoyed several years of quiet and prosperity. Now opinion was drifting away from his plans and he showed less skill than Hunter had done in keeping or winning support. When he found that members were opposing his plan of another five-year grant he expostulated with them and threatened to take from them the honors which he had conferred; but by such means they were not to be coerced and personal resentment was aroused. Burnet asked Clarke to assist him, and the latter used such personal appeals as were not inconsistent with his own interests. The members of the assembly were resolved at first to make a grant for only two years and also to reduce salaries somewhat;¹ but Burnet insisted upon the five-year term, and threatened to call the house together in successive sessions until he had gained his point. But this course he had to abandon as futile, and to compromise with the house on a three-year grant and at a somewhat reduced amount.²

The assembly, which had been elected under Hunter and had been in existence for eleven years, was now dissolved and a new election held.³ But it did not result, as the governor had hoped it might, in the return of a majority favorable to a grant of revenue for a five-year period, and the restoration of salaries and other appropriations to the amounts which had previously been given. Adolph Philipse was again chosen speaker. Burnet, who was greatly interested in the repair of the fort of New York and in the building of a trading post in the Indian country south of Lake Ontario, insisted that the appropriation was insufficient and smaller than the prosperous condition of the province justified. Much talk also had been occasioned by a reduction of the salary of Morris, the chief justice, to which his report on the DeLancey case had probably contributed. But a committee of the house reported that, in their opinion, the appropriation was fully adequate, though, if it should prove insufficient, the assembly would make it good.¹ No increase or change was made, though in 1727 £1682 was appropriated for the building of Oswego, on the southern shore of Lake Ontario. This was one of the most cherished objects of Burnet's policy, and its achievement proved a fitting close to his administration. The life of the new assembly was short, as it was brought to a close by the death of George I. The election of a new house in the fall of 1727 then became necessary.² This continued in existence only a single session, for on the transfer of Burnet to Massachusetts at the close of 1727 it was dissolved.

¹ Ass. J. I, 536; N. Y. Docs. V, 878 et seq.

² N. Y. Docs. V, 778; Col. Laws, II, 254 et seq.; Ass. J. I, 534-536. For the Governor's optimistic speech at the beginning of the fall session of 1725 and the entries which show the unresponsive temper of the house, see Ass. J. I, 516 et seq., 526, 529, 536.

³ Ass. J. I, 545 et seq.

Burnet's successor in New York was John Montgomerie, who, like so many other governors, was bred a soldier, but of late had been a groom of the bedchamber. He was a man of good intentions but small ability and was totally without experience in such an office as the one he was now called to fill. He held office from the spring of 1728 until his death in the summer of 1731. As he favored no particular policy and confined himself to the ordinary routine of government, affairs flowed on in a peaceful current. The fact which now, even among students of the period, chiefly rescues his name from oblivion is that it is attached to the revised charter which in his time was issued to the city of New York.

Controversy was avoided at the outset by the election of a new assembly soon after his arrival. During the last year of Burnet a bitter controversy had arisen over the court of chancery and over prosecutions by information on the part of the attorney general, Richard Bradley. The last mentioned complaint had been brought to the attention of the assembly by the justices of Albany county, who had been summoned before the supreme court on an information setting forth the insufficiency of the county jail.³ The attorney general met their complaint with the statement that his action had been taken on presentments of grand juries, that he had prosecuted no one and that the fees were only one-half what the complainants had stated they were. Similar informations however, had been filed in other counties and, in response to the general complaint, an act was passed forbidding such prosecutions in the future except upon presentments of grand juries or by order of the governor and council.¹

¹ Ass. J. I, 534, 549.

² Ibid., 557.

³ Ass. J. I, 569, 570.

But the more important issue was that which related to the court of chancery.² The powers of chancellor were exercised by the governor under the terms of his commission, as was common in the provinces, and no steps had been taken in New York to give this court a statutory basis. This furnished the real foundation for the complaints against the court. The occasion of their being urged so vigorously at this time was the fact that the speaker, Adolph Philipse, had recently lost a case involving rights to land before it; and also that the court had been especially active of late in suits for the recovery of quit rents.³ Near the close of Burnet's last assembly, at the instance of the speaker, the committee of grievances submitted a strong report against the court, alleging that there was a general outcry among the people on account of its violent measures, which were undermining liberty and property. Because of its illegality and of the excessive fees and bail which it fixed, an act, they said, should be passed declaring all its orders null and void, and the passage of a statute for the establishment and regulation of this court should be taken into consideration. It was because of these resolutions, coming as a surprise at the end of the session, that Burnet dissolved the assembly. The council, in a brief resolve, defended the court and later appointed a committee which prepared an elaborate reply to the charges. Because this committee called Henry Beekman, a member of the house, before it and questioned him, though unsuccessfully, about the charges against the chancery and their origin, Montgomerie's first assembly denounced this act, as a violation of its privileges in that no member should be called to account outside the house for what was said or done therein.¹ The council, in its turn, moralized on the serious encroachments that the assembly was making upon the prerogative, but the matter went no further at this time. Montgomerie, because of the strong feeling which had been aroused and aware of his total lack of qualification for the task, declined to sit as chancellor till further instructed from England.² The board of trade wrote to him that he ought to hold the court, but as it was not in the form of a positive instruction he either did not act at all or, if he did, he did not concern himself with quit rents. Because Rip Van Dam, who succeeded Montgomerie as president of the council, also declined this jurisdiction, the board warned him to act and to show special vigor in the matter of quit rents.

¹ Col. Laws, II, 406.

² Ass. J. I. 571 et seq.; N. Y. Docs. V, 847, 874, 876, 931, 946-7; J. of Leg. C. I, 563, 568-571; Minutes of Ex. C., Dec. 19, 1727.

³ As to the need of activity in this direction, a statement of Dixon, the receiver general, in 1718 is enlightening and it furnishes evidence of the continuance of old customs in New York. He stated the well known fact that, without pressure from a court of chancery, the payment of quit rents had always been systematically refused in New York. As to the size of land grants, he stated that tracts of 20,000 to 50,000 acres were granted at inconsiderable rents. Land holding had become a jobbing business, new purchasers holding of the original monopolizers, paying the prices they asked to the discouragement of settlement and the prejudice of the quit rents. The order in council of 1709, which forbade purchases of more than 1000 acres, was not obeyed. Many titles were illegal, and where quit rents were paid, some paid in money, others in grain, deer, beaver, otter, bear and other skins; some paid a peppercorn and some nothing. Cal. Treas. Papers, June 2, 1718. These same conditions continued and helped to give rise to the agitation respecting a court of chancery in Cosby's administration. Ibid., Dec. 10, 1731, and Dec. 15, 1733.

Montgomerie's conciliatory attitude brought immediate advantage in the form of an act appropriating supplies for the support of the government for five years. In accordance with previous usage the governor, by means of warrants, proceeded to adjust salaries so as to correspond with the revenue provided and to avoid a deficit.³ From time to time salaries had been changed by governors for reasons similar to this, and warrants stating the amounts were simply read before the council without its assent being asked. From 1691 to 1715 the salary of the chief justice had been £130 a year. Because of the expansion of settlement in the province, and also in recognition of the services of Lewis Morris in the financial adjustment of that year, his salary as chief justice was fixed at £300. It remained at that sum until

¹ Ass. J. I, 577; J. of Leg. C. I, 568 et seq. 578.

² N. Y. Docs., V, 874, 876, 931.

³ Ibid., 879 et seq.; VI, 10; N. Y. Hist. Colls., 1868, p. 221 et seq.; Ass. J. I, 580.

1726, when the assembly reduced it to £250.¹ But Burnet issued a warrant for the amount, as he did in the case of a few other officials whose salaries had been reduced by this assembly. In 1728 the assembly again voted £250 as the salary of the chief justice, and Montgomerie, considering this a fair amount and desiring to keep down expenditures, made the warrant correspond with the resolution. A protest was at once made in the council by the son of the chief justice. The governor turned to the council and it advised him to sign the warrant as it stood. This he did, and, so far as he was able to find, it was the first occasion on which a warrant of that nature was signed on the express advice of the council. The next day — June 13, 1729 — young Morris read a protest in the council which, in the opinion of that board, contained many false reflections upon the governor's conduct in drawing warrants on the revenue.² The council resolved that the governor had acted in the matter in accordance with law and precedent and that Morris ought to ask his pardon. On being called in Morris obeyed the command of the council, but on the 26th he presented another equally offensive protest, and because of this he was suspended from his seat in the council. The practice which Morris attacked was undoubtedly a bad one, a survival of the past which offered peculiar personal and political advantages to the governor.

In his second paper Morris, besides criticising the conduct of the governor in drawing warrants, protested against his sitting and voting with the council in the making of laws.³ This was a part of a broader argument, that the assembly was drawing to itself all the power in the government and that the governor was playing into its hands, not only by obeying all its orders in reference to revenue warrants but by reducing the authority of the council to a shadow by his active presence there when they were considering bills, appointments or other business. As the controlling relation was that existing between the governor and the assembly, and as it was determined by the control of the latter over the purse, the council, according to this view, was prevented by the presence of the governor from doing what otherwise it might as an opposition chamber. In all this Morris made no reflection on the personal integrity of Montgomerie, but he set forth his view, and defended it at length in a letter to the board of trade, as a correct account of the condition of the government in New York. The similarity between this and Logan's description of conditions in Pennsylvania under Keith is striking. Attorney General Bradley at this same time asserted that similar conditions were general in the colonies.¹ So impressed was Bradley with the growing strength of the colonies, with their tendency toward independence and the difficulty of subduing them, should this spirit gain the upper hand, that he thought immediate steps should be taken to make all officers of the crown independent of the assemblies and to place a royal commissioner, like the one who formerly officiated in Scotland, at the head of every one of them.

¹ It also cut off entirely the salary of Walters, the second judge, who, according to Montgomerie, was wholly unfitted by age and lack of ability for a seat on the bench.

² Ex. C. Minutes, June 13, 1729 et seq.; Cal. of Ex. C. Min. for same dates. Gov. Cosby stated at a later time that these papers were drawn by the elder Morris, the chief justice. N. Y. Docs., V, 946.

³ N. Y. Docs., V, 886.

Before proceeding further with the history of New Jersey it is necessary to refer again to the policy of the proprietors in the management of their territorial affairs. Though politically East and West Jersey had been united, territorially they remained distinct and separate. The overthrow of the opponents of Hunter carried with it the defeat and flight of the intriguer, Peter Sonmans, who, as representative of the minority of the East Jersey proprietors, had assumed to act as agent for their whole board. Sonmans carried with him the records of the proprietors and, though they later fell into the hands of Basse, he refused to surrender them.² But affairs were soon set going on a new basis by the appointment of James Smith as secretary of the province and register for the proprietors, while the long and close connection of James Alexander with New Jersey began with his appointment as surveyor general. Soon after Alexander received authority as receiver general to collect quit rents. The supporters of the governor among the East Jersey proprietors also included Morris, Dr. John Johnstone, Gordon and Willocks.

¹ Ibid., 901.

² Tanner, op. cit., 626, 628; N. J. Arch., IV, 172.

During some years prior to this the West Jersey proprietors, dominated by Coxe and his friends, had been engineering large purchases of land from the Indians in the northern part of the province, and the Coxe group was so manipulating the business as to assure the laying off of very liberal shares for themselves.¹ In the midst of this process, however, the Quaker interest was materially strengthened by the appearance of James Logan as claimant on behalf of William Penn, who had originally been associated with Lawrie and Lucas as assignees of Byllinge. Coxe also presented claims which he said were derived from Byllinge, but the Quaker interest was being strengthened in the board and large claims were made on behalf of Penn. The entire tract to be divided exceeded 200,000 acres. But before the process was completed the Coxe faction was worsted in the province at large. By proclamation of Hunter, Smith and Alexander were installed respectively as register and surveyor general of West Jersey, and Morris, who had quietly aided Hunter, returned to activity in the council of proprietors of West Jersey as its president, thus supplanting Coxe. Steps were now taken with a view of locating all records at Burlington and an attempt was made to adjust relations between the council of proprietors and the West Jersey Society.

Now that a greater degree of order was brought into proprietary affairs, the East Jersey proprietors brought a test suit against the Elizabethtown patentees and won, the decision being rendered in 1717. The Elizabethtown people then bought up such proprietary rights as they could within the tract which they claimed, with a view to further contention over the case in the future. The proprietors also strengthened themselves as they could by dividends from their lands. With the improvement of their status and the introduction of more order into their affairs, the two proprietary bodies addressed themselves to the settling of the boundary disputes which had long existed in the province, that over the line of division between East and West Jersey and that over the boundary between New Jersey and New York.² In 1687 and later, attempts had been made to agree upon the division line on the basis of a survey by George Keith, but this was too favorable to West Jersey to meet with acceptance. In 1719, at the instance of Logan and others, Hunter's last assembly passed an act the object of which was to establish a line in harmony with the provisions of the Quintipartite Deed and also to provide for the permanent maintenance of land offices at Burlington and Perth Amboy, where the proprietary records should be kept. The last named provision was put fully into execution and led to the establishment of offices, which are still in existence. The provision concerning the line failed of execution because of the interference of Coxe, who first entered a caveat against it in England and, after the accession of Burnet to the governorship, returned to New Jersey and again became president of the council of West Jersey proprietors. During the administrations which followed no progress could be made toward the settlement of this question, and at the close of Burnet's governorship an attempt even was made to secure in England the disallowance of the act of 1719.

¹ Tanner, 669 et seq.

² Tanner, 633 et seq. and references.

By the close of Hunter's administration the laying out of colonies on the upper Delaware and the appearance of settlers both from New York and the Jerseys had begun to result in disturbances of the peace. Since this dispute, as well as the running of the division line, called for the fixing of the most northerly point of New Jersey, which was supposed to be on the northernmost branch of the Delaware river in latitude $41^{\circ} 40'$, the two questions were connected and provision for running the two lines was made at the same time, in 1719. Commissioners were appointed by the two provinces, the actual surveys being conducted by James Alexander for New Jersey and Allen Jarret for New York. But, owing in part to imperfect instruments, they failed to agree and the controversy was continued, accompanied by collisions between the settlers, until 1767, when the line was finally settled by a commission named by the crown. New Jersey had to give up the point $41^{\circ} 40'$ and accept $40^{\circ} 21' 19''$, as the source of the Delaware, whence the line was run to the west bank of the Hudson at 41° . In general, it was during the decade and more which immediately followed the administration of Hunter that, under proprietary initiative, surveys of lands in the hilly regions of northern New Jersey were made, Indian titles were extinguished and claims were established which in the future were quite as likely to hinder as to facilitate settlement. The spirit of the New Jersey proprietors was similar to that which controlled the territorial policy of New York and showed itself everywhere as that of feudal landed monopoly.

The last four years of Hunter's administration were passed in comparative quiet. Coxe in England kept up an intrigue against the governor in such fashion that, in 1717, he succeeded in procuring the dispatch to the king of a rather numerous signed address of individuals purporting to be traders and inhabitants of New Jersey.¹ This contained a long list of charges, to which Hunter replied in even greater detail in a letter which he sent to Ambrose Philips, agent for New York. Though this showed that Hunter felt uneasy under the attack, it was needless, for his administration was approved by the crown. The assembly, which had supported him so well in 1715, was continued in existence until he retired from the governorship. Between this body and the governor no controversies arose. Considerable legislation of purely local interest was passed. The accounts of the treasurers of the two divisions of the province were inquired into with some care, and in the end, at the request of the assembly, they were appointed by the governor. Much attention was given to the bills of credit which were out, and in general these were well managed by New Jersey. Support for the government was voted for three years and salaries were slightly increased. This in substance is the record of the legislature and of its relations with the executive until the close of Hunter's governorship.

In New Jersey Lewis Morris, as president of the council, managed affairs during the interval between the departure of Hunter and the arrival of Burnet. Nothing of special note occurred except in reference to the running of the boundary lines, of which an account has just been given. In 1728, when Burnet was entering upon his short and troubled term as governor of Massachusetts, Hunter wrote to James Alexander concerning him, "He has an honest heart and good head, but over hott, which I was afraid might Some Time hurt him."¹ This remark well illustrates the difference between the two men and is justified by what we know of Burnet's career in the three provinces of which he was governor. In neither New York nor New Jersey did he have serious quarrels, but in neither also did he show the tact and diplomatic skill which characterized his predecessor. In New Jersey he followed the same policy as in New York, by continuing Hunter's assembly in existence. There was some opposition to this course in the first named province, but in New Jersey the feeling against it was so strong that it led to a heated conflict; though before this was ended Burnet received from the board of trade a full approval of his course in this matter. The members, when first called together, refused to consider themselves an assembly, but on the following day met and organized for business.² The chief cause of the trouble, however, seems to have been a move on the part of the Amboy group of proprietors to secure an act of incorporation so as to place control over proprietary interests in East Jersey in their hands. George Willocks, the Jacobite, was deep in the intrigue and Burnet came to believe that he was at the head of a plot to discredit his administration. Willocks was arrested for certain alleged acts of sedition and put under security for good behavior.

¹ N. J. Arch. IV, 306, 312; XIV, 71.

But good feeling was not restored and, to bring the house to terms respecting his demand for a more liberal support and the question of the currency, Burnet adjourned them from day to day for twenty days.³ This, of course, had quite the opposite effect from what was intended and, as the session continued, it degenerated into a tiresome interchange of exhortations, complaints and protests between the governor and the house, continued for a period of more than three months. One question at issue was the duration of the grant for the support of the government,—should it be for two years or unlimited in time or at least for five years? As the council supported the governor in this and tried to amend a house bill for a shorter term, the latter roundly asserted that the council had no right to amend money bills. The result was that no support was voted. Another question in dispute was, whether members should take the oath and qualify before the governor or the house. In connection with this Burnet insisted that the laws of the province regulating qualifications were not in force, because they had not been confirmed by the crown. He also produced an instruction which required that members should possess an estate of £500 current money.¹ That in these claims Burnet was exceeding what common usage demanded, was clearly indicated by the resolve of the assembly that provincial acts were in force until disallowed by the home government. To that safe position they naturally adhered. Burnet also sought to instill into the New Jersey assembly some of his zeal against the French and his fears that, through the labors of Joncaire, they were winning the Iroquois away from the British alliance. His demand was for an improved militia law preparatory for aid on the northern frontier, and also that forts might be built within New Jersey itself. To the first proposal he found the council amenable — though not to the second — but from the assembly no favorable action whatever could be obtained.² Because of the general irritation which had resulted from the tactlessness of the governor he was forced to dissolve the assembly in May 1721.

¹ N. J. Arch. V, 188.

² Ibid., 11, 32, 56; XIV, 145, 151, 183.

³ Ibid., XIV, 177, 180.

Burnet now urged the board of trade to procure the disallowance of two acts which were prejudicial to the secretary's office, and also to extend representation in the assembly to Hunterdon county. His objects in this were to administer a rebuke to the assembly and also to offset the undue weight of the town of Salem, whence "the ringleaders of the opposition" came, and to admit members from a newly settled part of the western division, the inhabitants of which he believed to be friendly to his administration.³ In the time of Lovelace an act had been passed regulating this subject, but it had not been sent to England for action by the crown. Therefore Burnet claimed that the right to fix the representation of localities in the assembly still remained in the crown and, as in Cornbury's time, could be exercised through instructions. An opinion in support of this view was procured from Redmond, the attorney general, and members from Hunterdon took the place of the two from Salem Town. This change was accepted without protest, and at the close of Burnet's administration was embodied in law.

¹ Ibid., 163.

² Ibid., 198.

³ N. J. Arch., V, 12, 72-74; Tanner, 323, 328.

Early in 1722 Burnet met his second assembly. The election had resulted in several changes of membership, and Johnstone, the proprietor, was chosen speaker. The governor attributed his troubles with the previous assembly largely to the influence from outside of George Willocks, the Jacobite. That same influence was still feared, and in a burst of temper Burnet suspended a member of the council for venturing to defend Willocks. The fears of the governor were doubtless greatly exaggerated, for Willocks was forced to leave the province and we hear no more of the disturbing elements which Burnet's fussy demands had brought into activity in his first assembly. With the present body, and also with another which was later elected and which was in existence when he was called to Massachusetts, harmonious relations were continued without a break. On two successive occasions appropriation acts to continue for five years were passed, thus assuring the regular work of government, though with very moderate salaries for lower officials, till the close of Burnet's term. A tolerably satisfactory militia law was also enacted. Trent,¹ a New Jersey man, was appointed to succeed Jameson as chief justice, and thus the succession of New Yorkers at the head of the provincial judiciary was broken. Progress was made toward an extended and more adequate salary system, but the assembly ignored petitions for claims on behalf of heirs of a number of officials who had served in the time of Cornbury. Deficiencies in the accounts of Thomas Gordon, the former treasurer, occasioned discussion between the houses and the question was finally adjusted by a prosecution of Gordon's estate in the name of the governor.

The improvement in salaries, as well as in the general financial condition of New Jersey, is of course to be chiefly attributed to its growth in wealth and population. But it was the firm opinion of Burnet that it was facilitated by the issue of bills of credit, for which additional provision, to the amount of £40,000, was made in 1724.¹ In recommending this measure to the board of trade for approval Burnet took his stand among the governors who defended the policy of such issues and made a notable argument in its support. He called attention to the straits to which people had been reduced for a medium in which to pay taxes before issues were resorted to. There was so little silver of any sort in the country, he said, that people were forced to cut their Spanish gold and even their rings and ear rings into small pieces to supply the lack. New York and Pennsylvania bills circulated in New Jersey, but were not legal tender. It was much better for New Jersey to have her own currency and receive the profit therefrom. In her issues thus far she had followed the conservative policy of her two neighboring provinces, in contrast to the New England colonies and South Carolina, and was keeping her promises as to redemption. In this way the evils of depreciation were being avoided. For these reasons, and owing to the loopholes in the wording of his instructions, Burnet pleaded successfully that this legislation might stand. But to his successor was issued the instruction, now becoming general, that he should not assent to any more such acts without the insertion of a suspending clause, and the further very restrictive order that he should not assent to any increases of salary by legislation without prior consent of the king.²

¹ Trent soon died and was succeeded in 1724 by Robert Lettice Hooper. N. J. Arch., V, 97.

By the last assembly of Burnet's administration, which met at Amboy at the close of 1727, a triennial act was passed,³ but this was later disallowed by the crown. Among several items of business the one which involved most controversy was connected with the recording of deeds and land titles and through that the control of territorial affairs. In the provinces, and especially in the proprietorships, this question was always in the near background. The lower houses of the assemblies, or the assemblies as a whole, were always seeking to control these affairs, while the provincial executives insisted that they were exclusively their affairs. The council of proprietors of East Jersey had recently been formed and it controlled the provincial council or upper house. Therefore, when the lower house tried to secure the passage of a law regulating the enrollment of deeds and conveyances of land, the council opposed and finally, by insisting also on the passage of a bill to prevent frauds and mistakes in obtaining warrants of survey, blocked legislation on this subject and nothing was done.¹

¹ N. J. Arch., V, 86-96, 193.

² Ibid., 174.

³ Ibid., 192, 235, 248; XIV, 470. Burnet thought New Jersey was entitled to this act as a consequence of the practice of annual elections under the proprietors and of the instruction to Cornbury that all beneficial laws should be reenacted.

During recent years John Kinsey, son of a former speaker of the assembly, had been growing in influence.² He was a chief originator of the triennial bill, of the act continuing in a somewhat freer form the right of Quakers to affirm, and of other popular measures. Toward the close of Burnet's administration he, with others, began actively to support a demand for complete separation from New York and to plan an address to the king for this purpose. But by threatening to dissolve the assembly, if this subject was not dropped, Burnet succeeded in checking its agitation until after the arrival of Montgomerie. Upon the advice of the council, the new governor decided, as Burnet had done, to retain the existing assembly. The session was held at Burlington and almost the first measure brought forward was a request for a conference between the governor and the two houses upon the subject of separation from New York. Kinsey was the leader in this movement, and it was the result of the consciousness that the advance of settlement and increase of wealth had brought New Jersey to a point where she was fitted for separate government. Montgomerie was so offended by what he considered the boldness of the assembly in proposing such a step without previously attempting to ascertain the king's pleasure in reference to it, that he dissolved the house.³ In reporting this to the board of trade the governor made a pretext for an attack on the Quakers, in which he declared that they did not deserve what they had received, and urged that both the triennial act and the recent act respecting affirmation should be disallowed. The reply of the board was favorable to Montgomerie's narrow views only in one point. Its faithful guardianship of the prerogative made it hostile to triennial bills wherever they were passed. But as to the move for a separate governor, the board thought they should not be discouraged from addressing the crown, while the recent act concerning the affirmation differed little from the provision of English law on the subject and could well lie by probationary in the hope that the conduct of the people would never be such as to necessitate its repeal.

¹ Ms. Journal of Assembly; N. J. Arch., XIV, 390; Tanner, 447.

² N. J. Arch., V, 262.

³ N. J. Arch., V, 235, 248; XIV, 399; Ms. Assy. Journal, Jan., 1728/9.

The composition of the next house, which did not meet until May 1730, was much the same as that of its predecessor, and that it would be disposed to support the same principles was indicated by the election of Kinsey as speaker. But the failure of the board of trade to support Montgomerie in his obstructionist attitude had removed the only causes of serious conflict. The chief debate of the session occurred in reference to a bill which, as finally drafted, coupled a provision for support of the government for five years with the converting into the treasury of the interest money derived from the outstanding bills of credit. This latter provision had been incorporated in an act of Burnet's administration and to it the board of trade was opposed. It insisted that the interest money should be used not to meet expenditures and so lessen taxation, but for the redemption of the currency and otherwise strengthening its credit.¹ On this subject Montgomerie expressed the same views as Burnet. He defended the policy of New Jersey in reference to its bills of credit and insisted that their credit was so good that the interest money was not needed to support it. All that he attempted to do was to induce the assembly to separate the two bills above referred to, but with the understanding that both should be accepted. Although the board of trade ordered Montgomerie to procure the repeal of the provision concerning the interest money, he was unable to do this without sacrificing the support and so the board had to acquiesce in this characteristic compromise.² With a formal address to the crown in favor of separation from New York and the employment by the assembly of Partridge as agent for five years, thus insuring active support of this demand in England, all except the routine work of this assembly closed.¹ Before it was called again Montgomerie had died and William Cosby had succeeded him in the governorship.

¹ N. J. Arch., V, 249; Tanner, 451, 557.

² N. J. Arch., V, 266, 269, 285.

Between these two events, however, lay an interval of more than a year — from July, 1731, to August, 1732. During that time New Jersey was administered by a president and council. Lewis Morris, as eldest councillor and by all means the most experienced man in New Jersey politics, had already served in the presidency, as we have seen, during the interval between the retirement of Hunter and the arrival of Burnet. He now resumed this position and, in a letter to the Duke of Newcastle,² added his testimony to that of others concerning the question of a separate government for New Jersey. He stated that the majority of the people favored it, but that a considerable section of them, who lived near New York, were opposed. If the separation occurred, he thought the appointees to the new governorship would find it difficult to make profit out of their office. "The rendering Governors and all other officers intirely dependant on the people is the generall inclination and endeavour of all the plantations in America, and nowhere pursued with more steadiness and less decency than in New Jersie, and were they Indulged with a separate governour before they had made proper provision for his support and that of the officers of the Government, he must be a man of very uncommon abilities who will be capable of working them up to their duty." Such was one of the pregnant statements of Morris on this question. Another had reference to a possibility that, if separation was granted, an attempt might be made to cramp the trade of New York unless the council of New Jersey was amply furnished with members who had interests in New York as well. In this the contrast between the point of view of Morris, whose interests were equally divided between the two provinces, and that of the Quakers appears with great clearness.

The administration of Cosby in New Jersey passed without notable incident. He continued Montgomerie's last assembly but nevertheless met it for only one session, in 1733. Support was continued for three years and, as previously, the interest money was appropriated toward meeting the charges of government.¹ It is also true that this act received the approval of the crown. As Cosby was already in the midst of his bitter quarrel with Morris and Alexander, he was naturally in a mood to welcome the proposal to name only residents of New Jersey to membership in the council. He was laboring at the same time to secure the removal of Morris and Alexander and, though he did not succeed, they did not attend the sessions of the council while Cosby was governor. In this quiet fashion, undisturbed by the passions which were agitating New York, New Jersey drifted on toward the time when separation from the neighbor province became possible.

¹ Ibid., 271; Ms. Ass. Journal, June 5, July 4, 1730; Tanner, 376.

² N. J. Arch., V, 314.

¹ Tanner, 453; N. J. Arch., XIV, 531.

CHAPTER V

CONTROVERSIES DURING THE ADMINISTRATIONS OF COSBY AND CLARKE. THE ZENGER EPISODE, 1730-1740

RIP VAN DAM, who, as president of the council and its oldest member, on the death of Montgomerie succeeded for a year to the headship of the government, was a Dutch merchant of New York city. He was one of those who, though he spent a long life in business and in office, never acquired an easy command of the English language. In politics he had been from the first an anti-Leislerian, and his special activities on that side in the time of Nanfan had recommended him to Cornbury and brought him immediate promotion to the council. He was a man of average abilities and during his presidency after the death of Montgomerie attempted nothing of note. At that time, however, the French established themselves at Crown Point (Fort St. Frederic), thus securing military control of Lake Champlain and making their most notable encroachment up to that time on the territory of the Six Nations, a region which was regarded by the English as virtually a part of their own possessions. This move, instead of a direct attack on that post, was the reply of the French to the founding of Oswego.¹ Another question of first importance at this time was the one which was involved in the proposed molasses act. New York held a prominent place among northern colonies whose commercial interests were imperilled by the restrictions which the merchants and planters of the British West Indies sought to impose. Its entire legislature therefore joined in a strong representation to the king against the policy, and by a statute six merchants in London were authorized to act as agents against it.²

But that Van Dam was more than casually connected with events of such wide importance, it would be absurd to suppose.

¹ Ass. J. I, 632.

² Ass. J. I, 628; Col. Laws, II, 729.

For some years now his name became prominent in New York politics, but it was in connection with events of a very different order. At the close of his brief administration New York entered upon another period of factional conflict as intense and prolonged as that which followed the Leisler uprising, and it was in this local struggle that Van Dam's name appeared with prominence. It was a struggle very typical of New York conditions, though some principles of wider significance found expression in it. With the utterance of these, however, Van Dam had no connection. He was engaged throughout in the stubborn assertion of his claims to money and office, and in the case of neither of these were his pretensions other than extreme and of doubtful validity.

The opponents against whom the claims of Van Dam were so persistently urged, both before the courts and by political measures, were the two men who followed Montgomerie in the governorship, William Cosby and George Clarke. At this point in the narrative it is necessary to speak only of Cosby. In England he belonged distinctly to the Newcastle connection, and his appointment was typical of many made by the duke during his long lease of power. Like so many other colonial governors, Cosby belonged to an Irish family which was prominent in the army. He himself had been an officer and had served as governor of Minorca. His wife was a sister of the second earl of Halifax, and during his residence in New York one of his daughters was married to a son of the duke of Grafton—"my Lord Augustus"—concerning whom and the fine impression he was making in America, the governor wrote in one of his familiar letters to the duke of Newcastle.¹ Cosby's letters show that he was destitute of culture, but, after his fashion, he was clearly a man of rather strong personality, self-willed and resourceful, accustomed to command, with the contempt of men in general which was characteristic of the soldier and of the ambitious courtier. The need of larger means with which to support a wife and several children with aristocratic connection furnished the motive which brought him to America, and among New York governors he occupies a position alongside of Fletcher and Cornbury as types of the greedy proconsul.

¹ N. Y. Docs. V, 930, 932, 937.

It is probable that Cosby did not so fully deserve this reputation as did his two predecessors, but it was his misfortune to live when the newspaper press was beginning to assert its power, and hostile public sentiment found expression concerning him which twenty or thirty years earlier it would have been impossible to embody in permanent form.

While Cosby was in Minorca he had been charged with taking arbitrary measures to secure the effects of a Catalan merchant, which he ordered seized at Port Mahon while Spain was at peace with England.¹ After his appointment, but before he left England, he had interested himself actively against the sugar bill, while it was before parliament and when New York and the other northern colonies were laboring to prevent its passage. For this service, though in the end it proved unsuccessful, he is said to have been exceedingly well paid. In his first letter to Newcastle after his arrival in New York Cosby expressed the hope that, out of his "wonted goodness and indulgent care of us," the duke would confirm "my son Billy" in a clerkship to which his father had named him. This "will give me a little more power," which he much needed, as the "Boston spirit" was spreading among the colonies, and secretaries and deputies thought and acted as if they were independent of governors.² "I make the right use of Mr. Clarke, He was my first minister," wrote Cosby; while with Charles Delafaye, under secretary of state, he was also on intimate terms. It is in letters of Newcastle's dependents, like Cosby and Clinton, that one finds frank avowals of the desire for patronage and acknowledgments of the most direct favors received.

The assembly, which was already in existence, Cosby continued and it proved to be not seriously out of harmony with the governor throughout his administration. However, it adopted resolutions in response, it said, to the general cry of the people, that "no fees can or ought to be exacted from the people by any officer or practitioner of the law whatsoever in the colony, but such as are or shall be established by consent in general assembly," and a committee was appointed to prepare a table of fees and a bill for its enactment.³ Little progress was made with the matter, and it soon dropped out of sight. Cosby experienced the favorable result of the good feeling toward the executive which prevailed at the time of his arrival, in the form of a five-years' grant for the support of the government.¹ In the resolutions his salary was fixed at £1560, with the addition of £400 per year for fuel and candles for the fort and £160 for his journey to Albany, besides presents for the Indians. Not content with these grants, Cosby asked for a further sum in reward for his services in support of the sugar bill. At first £750 was voted, and on Cosby expressing his dissatisfaction with this it was raised to £1000.² Even with this, Morris said, he expressed himself as dissatisfied, and that in contemptuous language.³

¹ Smith, op. cit., II, 1. ² N. Y. Docs., V, 937, 942. ³ Ass. J. I, 637.

But it was with Van Dam, a man as thrifty and persistent as himself, that Cosby almost immediately came into conflict over a question of perquisites. This occasioned the first appearance of the press in New York as an important agent in political affairs, and opened a series of conflicts which were scarcely to cease until they were merged in the struggle for independence. Van Dam, while president, had with the consent of the council received the whole of the governor's salary. This had been voted him after some hesitation by the council, of February 7, 1731/2.⁴ But, in accordance with general usage, Cosby brought with him the order of the king that this and all perquisites and emoluments should be divided for the term of the presidency, with the governor.⁵ On November 14, 1732, three and one-half months after Cosby had been sworn in as governor, the council, pursuant to the instruction, issued an order to Van Dam to refund. He, having doubtless been in consultation with James Alexander and other counsel and friends, sought excuses for delay. He would agree to the terms of the instruction, if the governor would divide with him the emoluments which he had received while in England, claiming that they amounted to more than

¹ Ibid., 646; Col. Laws, II, 768.

² Ass. J. I, 647.

³ Smith, op. cit., p. 2. It is probable that the reference by Morris in a letter to Colden, dated Jan. 17, 1734, is to the language which Cosby used on this occasion: "So that I flatter myself that in the next Reign polite literature will be introduced instead of God Dam ye." Ms. Colden Letters.

⁴ Ex. C. Minutes, Sept. 3, 1731, to close of Nov., 1732.

⁵ This was an additional instruction and was entered in Ex. C. Minutes, Nov. 14, 1732. N. Y. Docs. VI, 10. Smith, II, 4.

£6000, while those of Van Dam were less than £2000.¹ To this Cosby would not agree, and Van Dam refused to pay any of his half. Cosby thereupon instituted suit. He could not bring the suit in chancery, for there he would be judge in his own case. He therefore resorted to the court of exchequer, but suspecting that a jury might be prejudiced and bring in a verdict against him, upon advice he brought the suit in equity, that is, before the judges of the supreme court sitting on the equity side of the exchequer. The judges were the chief justice, Lewis Morris, and the first and second assistants, James DeLancey and the younger Frederick Philipse, a brother of the councillor. Of these the last two were and continued to be firm supporters of the governor; between Cosby and Morris friendly relations had never existed. Cosby said that Morris, who was chancellor of New Jersey, had slighted him when he first went there to receive the seals. They now at once became bitter enemies.² Bradley, the attorney general, acted as prosecuting officer against Van Dam, while the latter secured as counsel his friends James Alexander and William Smith, two of the ablest practitioners in New York. The constitutional question which this case at once brought to the front was that of the legality of courts which had no statutory basis, a question that also seriously agitated several other provinces.

When the case came up for trial, the counsel for Van Dam at once attacked the legality of the court, using against it the arguments which in the previous administration had been used against the court of chancery.³ When their plea and demurrer came to be argued, the chief justice instructed the counsel to consider only that part of the plea which struck at the jurisdiction of the exchequer as a court of equity or on its equity side. The counsel for the government replied that they had prepared to argue the whole plea and could not easily change. But the chief justice overruled them. As soon as the counsel had finished, the chief justice read a carefully prepared argument in support of the view put forth by Alexander and Smith, the counsel for the defense.

¹ See letters of Van Dam to Cosby, and estimates in the New York Public Library.

² For Morris' statement on this point see an appendix to his argument on the court of exchequer as a court of equity.

³ N. Y. Docs. VI, 10 et seq. Opinion of Morris C. J. and arguments of counsel are in N. Y. Public Library.

In this argument the case against the legality of courts established by ordinance in the colonies, and especially against courts of equity with fees so established, was presented with greater show of learning than was probably the case in any other colony or at any other time. It was in brief, following Coke, that a court of equity could exist in England by prescription but not by grant or by commission without an act of parliament; and as to fees, that the erection of an office with a fee attached was generally acknowledged to be a tallage and so required an act of parliament. In view of these facts, it was argued, though instructions might have been framed so as to appear to exclude the assembly from its right to erect courts and establish fees, they must not be interpreted in that sense. What the king could not do in England his governor and council could not do in a colony. Turning then to New York and to the court of exchequer, considered as a court of equity, the chief justice argued that the supreme court was one tribunal, a unit, and it was not contemplated that it should separate into distinct tribunals. Judges could not sit and reverse their own judgments; hence there could not be three distinct courts, as in England. The term court of exchequer then, when applied to the supreme court, must mean a court of law and not of equity. He then went on to show, from the legislation of 1683 and later years, that the supreme court of New York was created by statute and had continued to exist under such authority ever since. It had been claimed that by instruction to Bellomont in 1699, and on the expiration of earlier temporary acts, courts had been reestablished, and that since then they had rested upon ordinance. But this, he argued, was repugnant to the law of England, and could not be done by ordinance; and that furthermore, as the act of 1683 was perpetual, it revived as soon as the later temporary acts expired. The counsel for Van Dam added to the above the further claim that the ordinance, which it was claimed had created the court, expired on the death of George I, and no later one had been issued to reestablish it.

Of the justices, DeLancey and Philipse, the latter was not a trained lawyer, but the former had received in England the legal training which well-to-do colonials were now beginning to give their sons who were intended for the law. They now, after due preparation, delivered opinions in favor of the contention of the government, that is, of the legality of the exchequer as a court of equity, and that without statutory authority. The next day, after the last of these opinions had been rendered, Morris told his colleagues publicly from the bench that their arguments were mean, weak and futile, and that they were only his assistants, implying that when in opposition to him their opinion would not stand. DeLancey and Philipse resented this and insisted on their joint authority. Morris then left the bench and declared that he would sit no more with them when cases in equity came up. Cosby's suit, of course, was blocked, for no decision on his claim against Van Dam had been reached. Though the governor claimed that the opinion of the two assistants should stand as the opinion of the court, it is evident that the court was divided and no clear decision had been reached as to the legality of the jurisdiction claimed. But the opinion of a colonial court could not be final and, should the case be carried before the privy council, there could be no doubt that it would sustain the government. Of the argument which the assistants made at this time we have no record, but in the famous charge which he gave to the grand jury on libels DeLancey summed up his view concerning the court of exchequer.¹ His argument ran substantially as follows: That a court of exchequer had existed time out of mind in England and it had regularly heard suits in equity by English bill. The laws of New York had come in with the English, as into an uninhabited country, and the equity jurisdiction of the exchequer had been brought in with the rest. Laws, however, could not be executed without officers or courts established without judges, and appointment to office was a prerogative which was necessarily exercised in this case by governors. DeLancey also cited cases where the supreme court had expressly acted as a court of exchequer since the accession of George II and with Morris on the bench.² "In the winter of 1731," he continued, "during Van Dam's administration, there was held a weekly meeting of judges in town and of the most considerable lawyers; at one of these meetings it was proposed by one of them to bring the equity business into this court and a question arising, whether the judges were sufficiently empowered by their commission to determine causes brought by English bill, My commission and My brother Philipse were brought, and considered, and it was agreed by us all, to wit, Messrs Alexander, Horsmanden, Murray, Chambers, Smith, Jameson and Worrell, who were present at that meeting, that the judges were well empowered, and upon that they resolved to bring the business here accordingly." The reasons for this action were the great delays in chancery due to the frequent absences of the governors in Albany and New Jersey, and that it had better be done while there was no governor lest, when a new one came, he might dislike having business taken from his court and none of the lawyers would then take the initiative. By a writer on the other side it was admitted that these meetings were held and that Morris was interested; also that all were ready for the change, if it were possible and legal, and that because the chancery, as managed, was far from being a benefit to the people.¹ Morris, he continued, was in favor of trying it and probably would have continued in that opinion, had there not been a plea to the jurisdiction; this led him to a more strict inquiry, with the result which has been described.

¹ See DeLancey's Charge to the Grand Jury, Jan. 15, 1733/4.

² Murray, in a later opinion, cited several such cases.

As Morris had used expressions which he considered derogatory to the prerogative, Cosby sent to him for a certified copy of his argument. Instead of complying, Morris printed and circulated it, with a letter to the governor as an introduction.² Inasmuch as the chief justice held during the king's pleasure and was virtually an appointee of the governor, this was a bold act, and the method of it showed more of the political than of the judicial temper. It gave Cosby the opportunity to interpret his course as an appeal to the people against the other two judges. This, together with the position of Morris in New Jersey, led Cosby to remove him. It was done in the most contemptuous manner possible by simply advancing DeLancey to the chief justiceship, without any notification to Morris, the advancement of Philipse to the place of first assistant and the appointment of Daniel Horsmanden to the place which Philipse had held.¹ Cosby and his friends interpreted Morris's opinion as an attack on all equity courts in New York and hence on the prerogative. They were greatly impressed with the progress of "Boston principles" in New York, which must be checked by a determined stand for the executive and the crown. This course was taken wholly apart from the technical points in the dispute, which the governor did not pretend to follow or understand. The attitude of Morris and his son, with their other supporters, was equally political. Other chief justices had been removed, but rarely, if ever, a man with the political gifts and pugnacity of Lewis Morris. The conditions therefore were ripe for a spirited political conflict.

¹ See Observations on Charge of DeLancey. This very likely was written by Alexander and Smith.

² The Opinion and Argument of the Chief Justice of New York concerning the Jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the said Province to determine Causes in the Court of Equity. Printed by J. P. Zenger, 1733.

In the fall of 1733 Morris and his son Lewis ran for assembly in a by-election, one for the county and the other for the borough of Westchester, and both were elected.² The candidacy of the ex-chief justice for the county seat brought him directly into conflict with the Philipse and DeLancey families, both of which had large country estates in Westchester. William Forster, who originally had been sent over as a schoolmaster, but now, on appointment by Governor Cosby, held the offices of clerk of the peace and justice of common pleas for the county, was put up by the Philipse-DeLancey party as their candidate. Partisan zeal was roused to the highest pitch. The freeholders of the factions were marshalled at the polling place at Eastchester, as if in hostile feudal array, and physical conflict between the two seemed imminent. It was a conflict between aristocrats, the mass of the people of the county being their tenants and excluded from the suffrage. The closest approach to a fight at the polls came when, by a partisan decision of the sheriff, a stranger in the county and a supporter of Cosby, thirty-seven Quakers who desired to vote for Morris were excluded because they would not take the oath. Nevertheless Morris was returned by a large majority, and his election was hailed with great rejoicing when he returned to the city of New York.

¹ This was a supersedeas without a statement of reason. The governor's instructions, however, required that in such cases he should submit good reasons to the king and board of trade.

² Zenger's Journal, No. 1, Nov. 5, 1733; Smith, op. cit., II, 7.

A year later, at the close of September, 1734, occurred the annual charter election in New York City.¹ Feeling between the Cosby and Morris factions had long been at fever heat in the city. The followers of Morris felt that their liberties were at stake and that they were fighting over again the battles of Leisler and his time. The result at the polls was another decisive victory for Morris and the election of a common council in which there was only a single supporter of Cosby.

A formidable array of lawyers, merchants and people of all classes in the city and near-by sections outside were now in revolt against the government clique. Under the lead of Morris, Alexander and Smith, who probably formed the nucleus of a political club, a form of political agitation, new to the colonies outside of Massachusetts, was started. This was an opposition newspaper, the "New York Weekly Journal," under the editorship of John Peter Zenger. He was the son of one of the Palatine immigrants of 1709. His father was one of the ablest men of that company and became, as we have seen, a leader in their struggles for a tolerable place of settlement after the failure of the experiment on the Hudson. The young Zenger had become a printer in the office of William Bradford, who was the publisher of the "New York Gazette" and by whom all the official printing was done. Though Bradford personally tried to hold a neutral position, his "Gazette" became perforce the organ of the governor's party.

With the appearance of Zenger's sheet a new and much more aggressive spirit was infused into New York journalism and after a time, as public feeling demanded it, this found its way into other papers in various colonies. Zenger himself was more truly the publisher than the editor of his "Journal." But he was held legally responsible for what appeared in its columns and his title to fame rests less upon what he can fairly be supposed to have written than upon his nerve and resource as a publisher, and upon the success which attended his fortunes in the famous libel suit which was brought against him. No one can carefully read the discussions which appeared in Zenger's "Journal" during this controversy without being convinced that they were mainly written, and all of them inspired, by the group of lawyers who supported the enterprise.¹ Cosby charged Alexander and Morris with being responsible for many of them, and they not infrequently reflect the views of Morris.² All reflect the spirit of political discussions which had appeared in the English press during the previous generation or two, though the legal tone which pervades them is so pronounced, and resembles to such an extent the opinions and arguments of which we know these men to have been the authors, that the origin of the articles can hardly be a matter of doubt.

¹ Minutes of Common Council of City of New York, IV, 217, 228.

In the early numbers the subject of the liberty of the press, in its political bearings under a limited monarchy, was discussed.³ These articles, like many on other subjects, were signed "Cato," and were of the moralizing type characteristic of the eighteenth century. Their authors delighted in classical allusions. The philosophy of Locke lay at the foundation of their views of government, and English history, interpreted in the light of Whig principles, furnished the precedents from which many of their lessons were drawn. Coke was their oracle of the law. One of the later articles was a reprint from the "Spectator,"⁴ and it is not improbable that a critical examination would show a larger indebtedness to that or other publications of the age of Anne. One of the early articles starts with the idea of contract between rulers and subjects.⁵ The liberties of true Englishmen was a favorite subject,⁶ and it was asserted that, while it was the prerogative of the prince to choose his ministers, it was the privilege

¹ Smith mentions Trenchard and Gordon as among the authors of these papers. Smith, II, 7.

² N. Y. Docs. VI, 6, 21.

³ Numbers 2 and 3.

⁴ An article in No. 82 of the "Journal" is No. 287 of the "Spectator." An article in No. 10 was by Richard Steele.

⁵ No. 4.

⁶ No. 10.

of the people through their representatives to arraign the conduct of those ministers. Government by law was the principle asserted, and under that system popular privilege and executive power were equally sacred. A practical deduction which brought the discussion more closely home to New York politics was this, that the affairs of government should be public and therefore that it was the business of private men to meddle with government.¹ "Every man ought to know what it concerns all to know. Now nothing on earth is of a more universal nature than government and every private man on earth hath a concern in it, because in it is concerned . . . his virtue, his property and the security of his person. . . ." The necessity of criticising public men was strongly enforced. "The only security we can have that men will be honest is to make it their interest to be honest; and the best defense we can have against their being knaves is to make it terrible to them to be knaves." "Frequently men who are directing government find it their interest to plunder and oppress," and while the public voice is pretended to be declared by one or a few, for vile and private ends, the public know nothing of what is done till they feel the terrible effect of it." "The difference between free and enslaved countries lies principally here, that in the former the magistrates must consult the voice and interest of the people, but in the latter the private will, interest and pleasure of the governors are the sole end and motives of their administration."

From sentiments such as these it was only a step to direct attacks on the executive and ruling clique in New York; communications from private persons soon began to appear in the "Journal," and one of these led, in Number 12, January 21, 1733/4, to a slashing attack on governors. It is not unlikely that this came from Zenger's own pen, for it spoke of the halter as a proper reward for many things which governors had done with impunity. Some governors were likened to wolves, robbers, pirates, enemies, the devil. "There have been Nicholsons, Cornburys, Cootes, Burring-tons, Edens. . . . and many more, as very bashaws as ever were sent from Constantinople" and "there have not been wanting under each of such administrations persons, the dregs and scandal of human nature, who have kept in with them and used their endeavors to enslave their fellow subjects and persuaded others so to do. And had there been any spirit left in the wretches who suffered themselves to be enslaved, they would by a bold and legal resistance have made these men either good governors or at least prevented them from doing much mischief and rendered them as contemptible in their governments as most of them were when they were out of them." Among the advertisements in the paper it was said that a list of names was being prepared of those who were known to have flattered governors and been instruments of introducing and continuing arbitrary power. In order to bring articles written in this spirit within reach of prosecution under the law of libel it was only necessary that they should contain references a little more explicit to living men and contemporary events.

¹ See Numbers 6 and 19. In Number 16 the administration of government was declared to be "nothing else but the attendance of the trustees of the people upon the interest and affairs of the people," and it was the business of the people to see whether public business was well or ill transacted.

During the winter of 1733/4 the opposition started more than one scandalous charge against the governor or men who were prominently supporting him. One of these was occasioned by the visit of two French vessels from Louisburg to secure provisions to prevent a possible famine at that fortress,¹ due to the failure of crops in Canada whence their supplies were usually obtained. Though the French brought properly accredited letters, the report spread that they were taking soundings in the harbor and the enemies of the governor charged him with betraying the port to the hereditary enemy by his neglect to ascertain what their errand really was. Van Dam incorporated this in the long list of charges against Cosby which he sent to England.

On the night of the first of February an anonymous letter, containing a demand for money on the threat of destroying him and his family, was left at the house of James Alexander.² Several persons affirmed that the letter was in the handwriting of Francis Harison, who was a leading supporter of the governor in the council and who also held four other offices, among them being that of recorder of the city and judge of admiralty.

¹ N. Y. Docs., V, 958, 959, 970, 978.

² Smith, II, 8; N. Y. Docs., VI. 21.

The matter was brought before the grand jury, but it could find no direct evidence. The council appointed a committee to investigate it, but because Harison was a member of it neither Alexander nor Smith would appear before the committee. This body exonerated Harison in a strongly worded report and expressed the opinion that the letter was a forgery, the purpose of its author being to destroy the reputation of an honorable member of the council. To the candid investigator this seems to be the only reasonable explanation of this clumsy affair. But Harison was an unpopular man and other charges against him were being circulated. He issued an address in self-defence, but this rather increased feeling against him. Partly because of public suspicion he soon removed to England, though it was also claimed that he went to oppose the plans of Morris.

The fact that Cosby, about the close of 1733, procured from the Mohawk tribe a grant to the king of a tract of 1200 acres near Fort Hunter, to which land the city of Albany had for some years held a deed, raised a cry that land grants, especially on Long Island, might be in danger.¹ At the same time also Van Dam sent his voluminous charges to the board of trade, and the council filed a labored answer to them.²

The comparative futility of these attacks under the system of privilege, with restricted suffrage and almost total lack of means for creating and focusing public opinion, which then existed, is shown by the fact that Cosby felt strong enough to call the assembly together in April, 1734. Adolph Philipse was still speaker. A large part of the members were practically unaffected by the agitation which was in progress. As no salary question was pending, the session passed peacefully. In his address the governor sought to explain the sluggishness of trade by affirming that New Yorkers had allowed Barbadians to become their carriers, had neglected shipbuilding and had not kept up the quality of flour — their staple product — by proper inspection.³ He recommended a stamp duty as a relief to trade, which then bore the heaviest burden of taxation. He also urged the improvement of the defences of New York and of the frontier, and plans for such were submitted. An act providing that the affirmation of Quakers should have the force of an oath was passed, and such injustice as had been committed at the Westchester election was made impossible. The court party also proposed as popular measures a bill for triennial elections and another for the balloting of jurors; petitions were also presented for an act limiting fees.¹ The opposition made an effort to get rid of the court of exchequer, and on the strength of petitions from Queens and Westchester counties that courts might be established only by statute, William Smith and Joseph Murray were called to argue before the house the question of the legality of that court as established by prerogative. Each made an elaborate plea, bristling with legal learning, Smith against Murray for its legality. For this they received the thanks of the house and the arguments were printed.²

¹ N. Y. Docs., VI, 6, 15, 25. Cosby wrote that the Mohawks threatened to leave the province unless they were protected against the Albanians; Smith, II, 25. As to the many large grants made to Cosby, see Keys, Cadwallader Colden, 51.

² N. Y. Docs. V, 974 et seq.

³ Ass. J. I. 654.

In style and argument Smith's plea was decidedly the abler of the two. He showed that in England even the most ancient courts had received statutory regulation and later ones had been erected by parliament, until on the abolition of Star Chamber a decisive pronouncement had been made against purely prerogative tribunals. As to the colonies, the argument was still stronger, for not only did the colonists live under the same constitution as modern England, but judges were more dependent upon the executive in America than in the mother country and therefore needed the backing of the legislatures, which were the great guarantors of colonial liberties. There was no more important work of government, he said, than the establishment and regulation of courts, for upon that depended the purity of justice at the fountain head. Murray, as he was defending the existing system, argued more closely along the line of precedent, broadening it by the contention, as DeLancey had done, that courts of equity had come in, not by virtue of royal commissions, but with the body of English laws, as a part of which they existed.

It was in the theory which he advanced of the mode and effect of the extension of English law to the colonies that Smith made his most original contribution to the discussion. He argued that, not similar laws but the very same laws as those of England were extended to the colonies, as the Hudson was the very same through its entire course. The use which he made of this idea was to insist that, as in England the nation could choose the laws by which it was governed, choose its courts and determine the way in which the law should be administered, so the colonists could do as the result of the extension of laws and rights to them. As the people in England had the right to refuse submission to any court not erected by lawful authority, so had the colonists. With the introduction of English law went also the right of the colonists to consent to that which should be introduced, that depending on the adaptability of such laws to colonial needs and conditions. If, on the other hand, courts and laws were extended by likeness merely, much might be forced upon the colonists against their choice, much that was not intended for them in the first place and which was not adapted to their needs. The cases of tithes and of the ecclesiastical laws and courts of England in general were cited by Smith as examples in point. It was by this closer analysis of the subject that he sought to meet the contention of DeLancey and Murray and their summary and ready-made statements concerning the way in which English law was introduced. But it was an ingenious claim rather than an argument which was expected to change facts or views as they were generally accepted at the time. "Had the governor appointed other barons," says the historian Smith, "all clamor against the legality of the court of Exchequer must have ceased." "Nothing was less the intention of the contending parties than a just and friendly pacification." The fires of faction were lighted and they had to burn until some of the leading parties were removed from the scene.

¹ Ibid., 660, 661.

² Printed copies of these pleas are in the New York Public Library.

In the fall of 1734 steps were taken for the punishment of Zenger.¹ At the October session of the supreme court the chief justice obtained from the grand jury a presentment of certain doggerel rimes which had appeared in his paper and an order that they be burned. The jury asked the governor to offer a reward for the discovery of the author. The council also took up the matter and asked the assembly to concur in an address to the governor for the prosecution of the printer; but the house tabled this proposal.¹ Then the council, acting in its executive capacity, ordered Nos. 7, 47, 48 and 49 of the "Weekly Journal" to be burned by the common hangman or whipper and that the mayor and magistrates of the city should attend the burning. But the court of quarter sessions of New York county would not suffer the order to be entered and the aldermen forbade the whipper to obey the order.² It had therefore to be executed by a negro slave belonging to the sheriff, only Recorder Harison and a few dependents of the governor being present. A few days later Zenger, under authority of a proclamation, was arrested and in prison was denied pen, ink and paper. He was brought before Chief Justice DeLancey for release on bail, but it was fixed at £400 for himself and £200 for each of two sureties. This was more than he could furnish and he was remanded to prison.

¹ Smith, II, 15 et seq. DeLancey in his charge to this jury explained the law of libel, quoting from Hawkins, Pleas of the Crown, and called their attention to the dangerous extent to which public criticism of persons of all degrees had gone and to the necessity of resorting to punishment (Ms. in N. Y. Public Library).

On the last day of the court term, the grand jury having found nothing against him, he expected to be released; but instead the attorney general proceeded against him by information for parts of Nos. 13 and 23 of his paper, as false, scandalous and seditious libels. The trial came on in the April term of 1735, Smith and Alexander appearing as Zenger's counsel. They at once attacked the validity of the appointment of DeLancey and Philipse as judges, thus demanding a new constitution, not only of this court but of the courts generally in the colonies. The defects in the commissions of the judges against which they directed their assaults were these: that they were granted during pleasure, that the recipients of them were made justices of both king's bench and common pleas, that the form of their commissions was not warranted by any statute of Great Britain or of New York, and that they were not granted with the consent of the council.

¹ Ass. J. I, 671; 672.

² No reference to these events occurs in the Minutes of the Common Council of the city. For events from this point on see Smith, op. cit., and A brief Narrative of the Case and Tryal of John Peter Zenger.

On the following day, after counsel had fully affirmed their readiness to argue those points as exceptions, the chief justice told them that the court would neither hear nor allow the exceptions. "You have brought it to that point," he continued, "that either we must go from the bench or you from the bar." He then declared them disbarred and a decree to that effect was entered, though Smith and Alexander protested against the statement in it that they had denied the existence of the court itself. In view of the revolutionary nature of their plea and its evident political intent, their fate hardly seems strange, even though they were leaders of the bar.

By this event the trial of Zenger was delayed until the following August. Then it was held before the supreme court with a struck jury, John Chambers appearing as counsel for the accused, and Bradley, the attorney general, managing the case for the government. But since the trial had first been called, Zenger and his friends had secured the services of the venerable Andrew Hamilton of Philadelphia as special counsel, though his presence in that capacity was not generally known until he rose to address the court. His talent was now to make up for the loss of the services of Smith and Alexander. The sole issue in this trial was that of libel, and the law as it then stood could not have been more clearly stated than it was from the bench and by the attorney general, while Hamilton's plea for the right of the jury in such cases to inquire into the evidence of the truth or falsehood of libels proved to be the greatest oratorical triumph won in the colonies prior to the speech of James Otis against writs of assistance.¹

The law and usual procedure in such cases only required of the prosecution that it should prove the fact of publication by the accused, and upon this point alone the jury must render its verdict. The decision as to the character and intent of the publication, whether or not it was false, malicious, scandalous or seditious, was left to the judges. As DeLancey stated it in this case, "The jury may find that Zenger printed and published those papers, and leave it to the court to judge whether they are libellous; . . . it is in the nature of a special verdict, where the jury leave the matter of law to the court."¹ The definition of what was libellous was also so broadly drawn as to include all writings which were in the form of insinuations or innuendoes, the intent of which was to bring a person, or especially an official, into contempt. Under the law as thus interpreted, provided the fact of publication was proven, Zenger could never have escaped the penalty. The net was so spread as to catch every critic of the government whom it was worth while to suppress.

¹ Chandler, American Criminal Trials, I, 159 et seq.

Hamilton began by fully admitting the fact of publication. Bradley then insisted that the jury must at once find a verdict of guilty. But Hamilton claimed the right to submit evidence that the statements in the papers were not false and scandalous, as alleged in the information. This the court refused to permit, on the ground that such publications were libels, even though they were true.² Finding his course in that direction blocked by a positive and, as the law then stood, a correct ruling of the court, Hamilton turned to the jury for the purpose of convincing them that their liberties were at stake and for that reason they must assert the right of judging the nature of these publications and the truth which they contained. He then enlarged upon the power of a colonial governor and the difficulty of securing redress against him. The perils and encroachments of power he illustrated from the history of the Tudors and Stuarts, as well as from that of Rome. He enlarged upon the use which had been made of the law of libel in this process, and how jury trial had virtually lost its utility in such cases. In a few cases, however, like that of Penn and Mead and of the seven bishops, juries had performed their rightful function, though at great personal peril. His address, of powerful but restrained eloquence, closed with an appeal to the jury to render a verdict which would help to secure to themselves and their posterity the right to oppose arbitrary power by speaking and writing truth. To the seriousness of the issue the jury was quick to respond by a verdict of not guilty. Under the circumstances this was to have been expected from almost any jury of average colonials, after such a presentation of the subject as Hamilton had given them. That the prevailing public sentiment was in full accord with the result was evidenced by the repeated outbursts of applause from the people who crowded into the courtroom and by the greetings which Hamilton received outside, it all culminating in the bestowment upon him of the freedom of the city. Trial by jury in libel cases had been shown to be something more than a farce in New York. In its first encounter with a newspaper press the official clique had been beaten, and this early publication in the colonies which, like James Franklin's "New England Courant" in Boston, had ventured upon trenchant and persistent criticism of the government and of established prejudices was not throttled, but permitted to continue its work. A long time, however, passed before circumstances recurred in any colony, or in the colonies in general, which were so favorable to an attack on privilege as those which existed in New York at this juncture.

¹ Ibid., 175.

² Ibid., 167-170.

In the following October Smith and Alexander submitted to the assembly a petition, setting forth complaints at large against the conduct of the justices of the supreme court and asked for a speedy hearing.¹ Impeachment of the judges was undoubtedly their object. The petition was referred to the committee on grievances, and upon its report the house ordered that the petitioners, within twenty days, should deliver to the justices a copy of their complaints and that in forty days thereafter the judges should make answer thereto; this in turn should be submitted to the petitioners. This was at once understood to mean indefinite delay, and though, in December, the two complainants laid before the committee of the assembly, as a plea against their disbarment, the reasons which had moved them to attack the commissions of the judges. As the court must rest upon the law, this was very different they contended from denying the being of the court.² They cited cases where similar pleas had been made both in England and the colonies, but the accused had never been visited with disbarment, an extreme penalty indeed. The hearing of the case against the judges was of course prevented by an adjournment of the assembly, but the decree against the two lawyers, as we shall see, was later set aside by the court and they were readmitted to practice.

¹ Ass. J. I, 682, 683.

² Complaint of Alexander and Smith to the Committee of the General Assembly.

The opponents of the government in New York City now petitioned for the dissolution of the assembly and a new election.¹ This body had been in existence since 1728, and the long intermission between elections was declared to be a most serious grievance. The petition was supported by an expression from the assembly itself of a unanimous desire that it might be dissolved, a wish which it had also expressed nearly a year before. But the experiment was far too dangerous for Cosby to try at that time, and when the petition came before him it met with a flat refusal. Again complaints were urged against the court of chancery as organized, and in connection with suits relating to grants of land in various parts of the province in which members of the council, as well as the governor, were eager to share. It was in connection with these doings that Colden came near losing his office of surveyor general. Horsmanden and Alexander, of the council, were closely concerned in these transactions, the latter being eager by land speculations to retrieve his damaged fortunes.² When, in the midst of the quarrel with Cosby, some of these questions were being brought by the attorney general before the court of chancery and the governor proposed to sit as judge, Alexander and some of his friends filed exceptions against the legality of the court.³ This was the first time that private parties had questioned its jurisdiction, and Cosby refused to entertain their plea. In a letter to the board of trade he added this to his many other charges, particularly against Alexander, and the board in its reply, September, 1735, expressed its hearty approval of the governor's action, assuring him that the legality of the court had been confirmed in the commission of every governor since the infancy of the colony and that he would do well to sit as chancellor whenever there was occasion. They now recommended the removal of Van Dam and Alexander from the council. On another complaint, which at the same time was urged against Cosby, the board of trade disapproved of his action and an opinion was obtained from the attorney general and solicitor general that it was illegal.¹ This was his practice, still common in the province, of sitting and voting with the council when it was in legislative session. The board also disapproved of his alleged practice of insisting that bills which had passed the assembly should be presented to him before they were laid before the council. This action was intended to bring such conduct to an end in all provinces where it still continued, and the board urged that the governors should be instructed accordingly.

¹ Ass. J. I, 686.

² Light is thrown on these doings by unpublished Colden Papers of dates 1734-1736, in the Library of the N. Y. Hist. Soc.

³ Ms. Colden Papers, Alexander to Colden, April 8, 1735; N. Y. Docs. VI, 30, 35-36. The grant concerning which this suit was to be brought had been made in Montgomerie's time.

Ever since the beginning of the factional strife Cosby, in his letters to the board of trade, had been denouncing Morris, Van Dam and their supporters. As time passed, Alexander came in for a full share of the governor's criticism. He demanded the removal of the two councillors and the confirmation of his removal of the chief justice. It was really a quarrel within the council, in which through the press an appeal was sought to the people in general and an attack was made upon the courts. Toward the end of 1734 Morris quietly left New York for England, in order to support his cause there in person. By this process the charges and counter-charges came before the board of trade and were widely discussed in circles which were interested in Cosby's fortunes and New York affairs.² Morris submitted an account of his entire political career, with a full defence of his conduct in New York, against the charges of the governor. He also acted virtually as agent for the opponents of Cosby as a whole, a function for which his wide acquaintance and his experience against the proprietors of New Jersey well qualified him. A decision in the case of Morris was not reached until November, 1735, when an order in council was issued disapproving of the method used by Cosby in his removal and also declaring the reasons which, at the command of the king, he had subsequently given for this act to be insufficient.³ Morris, however, did not return to the office,

¹ N. Y. Docs. VI, 40, 41.

² See N. Y. Docs. V, 951, 975, 979, VI, 8, 36. The case of Lewis Morris (Ms. in N. Y. Public Library); Ms. Colden Papers; N. Y. Gazette, Nov., 1734.

³ N. Y. Docs. VI, 36.

but when, a few years later, the separation of New Jersey from New York was completed he became the first governor of the new province.

The death of Governor Cosby, after a prolonged illness, on March 10, 1735/6, relieved the situation in one way, but only to open fresh complications of a different, though related, sort. On the 24th of the previous November, when in an early stage of his sickness, Cosby, at a meeting of the council held in his bedchamber, had suspended Van Dam from membership and had said that he would lay the reasons for so doing before the king.¹ This does not seem to have been done, though the governor's correspondence in the past had abounded in charges against Van Dam and Alexander and demands for their removal.

On the death of the governor, George Clarke, who was the eldest councillor remaining, at once called that body together.² The royal commission and instructions to the governor were read and also the order for the suspension of Van Dam. The clerk also swore that the notice of suspension had been served on Van Dam. All the members who were present, with the exception of Alexander, voted to swear in Clarke as president and head of the government, and it was done. Alexander stated that he was not prepared to give his opinion.

Clarke had long lived in the province. He was a nephew of William Blathwayt and through him had obtained appointment as secretary to succeed Matthew Clarkson in the time of Cornbury. He had also served as deputy auditor. He married Anne Hyde, a distant relative of Queen Anne, and had a country seat at Hempstead, where he lived much until 1738. His long residence and tenure of various offices made him thoroughly acquainted with New York. In its politics he had quietly, though constantly, participated for thirty years. He was, says Smith, "sensible, artful, active, cautious; had a perfect command of his temper, and was in his address spacious and civil." He was therefore fitted to conciliate, to restore political calm, and yet not to depart essentially from official routine and the accepted policy of the British government. When the troubles of Cosby's administration were at their height he was in complete retirement at his country estate, and had left DeLancey and Harison among the councillors to bear the chief weight of unpopularity. Though a man of lower type than Hunter, he was well fitted to play a part as pacificator analogous to that by which the Leisler controversies had been terminated.

¹ Ex. C. Minutes, Nov. 24, 1735.

² N. Y. Col. Docs. VI, 43, 46, 48; Ex. C. Min. March 10, 1735/6. See accounts also in N. Y. Gazette and N. Y. Journal.

On the day following the installation of Clarke in the presidency, Van Dam came with witnesses to the gate of the Fort and demanded admission to Lady Cosby. On being told that she was not in a condition to see him, he requested that an open letter which he had in his hand might be delivered to her, and finally gave this letter to an officer of the guard to be delivered. It contained a demand for the commission, seal and instructions. Clarke himself now answered the summons in person, and Van Dam delivered to him a copy of the same letter and demanded his reply in writing.¹ This he sent as soon as possible, with the advice of the councillors who were with Clarke, stating that the documents in question belonged in his custody as the sworn head of the government. Van Dam then published a protest against all that Clarke had done. On the 18th Clarke, in reply to this, published a proclamation that he had assumed the government and warned all the officials to continue in the performance of their duties until the further pleasure of the king was known.² He also wrote to the board of trade, to Newcastle and to Horatio Walpole, the auditor general, most urgently insisting that Van Dam and Alexander be removed, as the only means of checking faction, and also that Morris be not restored to the chief justiceship. Popular agitation, he said, was again rising, this time against himself, and Van Dam was being used as a tool by much abler men to provoke an outbreak. In the absence of his father, the younger Lewis Morris was active among the opponents of government. Sundry of the officials and inhabitants of New York City also, as well as freeholders of Queens and Ulster counties, had petitioned the king to appoint the elder Morris agent, but this was reproved by an order in council as irregular and unprecedented.³

¹ N. Y. Docs., VI, 44, 45.

² N. Y. Gazette, Numbers 543, 544.

³ N. Y. Docs. VI, 51.

Another perplexing and dangerous element in the situation for Clarke was the assembly. An effort was made to hold a session early in April, but a sufficient number followed Morris, in his urgent insistence that they could not act, to prevent the house from sitting.¹ Clarke then continued the assembly in existence by short adjournments until October, when a session was held. Meantime trenchant articles appeared in Zenger's "Journal" enforcing all the arguments which an acute legal mind could suggest against a recognition of Clarke by the assembly, if perchance its legal existence had not been terminated by the death of Cosby.² Clarke meantime, who was not a rich man, had to sustain the dignity of the government, with a very uncertain prospect of salary or reward in the future. A new governor might be appointed, but he hoped that until that occurred the entire salary of the office would be allowed him and that he would be continued in charge of the government long enough to make good his losses. The existing revenue act would expire the following year, and Clarke's opponents were extremely anxious to procure a dissolution of the existing assembly before that time. But while acting in his present capacity he could not dissolve it, and of course his opponents had no candidate whom they could support with the slightest probability of his appointment as governor.

In the meantime Clarke continued to write to the board of trade and to Newcastle assurances that faction was subsiding, and would continue to do so if a new election could be avoided and a continuance of the support of government assured.³ This he was in due time to receive, for on July 13, 1736, a commission was issued in England making him lieutenant governor.⁴ But before that arrived and while the assembly was still prorogued, Morris made his appearance in Boston. The twenty-ninth of September was the day when the governor or acting governor regularly appointed the mayor, recorder, sheriff and coroner of New York City and county.⁵ In the city and among its officials sympathy with Van Dam was strong, and they urged Clarke to appoint no new magis-

¹ Ibid., 52-56; Ass. J. I, 688.

² Nos 144, 149.

³ N. Y. Col. Docs. VI, 65, 66, 73.

⁴ Ibid., 71, 83.

⁵ Ibid., 78-80.

trates, but at most to continue the existing ones, lest, if they received new offices from him, their charter might be violated and they lose it. Van Dam was also approached with the inquiry, whether or not he would appoint. When the day came, Clarke issued an order continuing the officials in their places.¹ Van Dam, however, called a meeting of the executive council, which was attended only by Alexander, and proceeded to appoint Cornelius Van Horne mayor and William Smith recorder, and also a sheriff and coroner. The election for aldermen and members of the common council also went in favor of the party of Van Dam.² Fearing an uprising, Clarke now withdrew from the city into the fort and an additional supply of gunpowder was ordered. A paper was circulated declaring that Van Dam was entitled to the government, but this was signed in only two out of the five wards. Morris arrived from Boston and was boisterously received by a great gathering of his supporters. Though he soon left for New Jersey, while he remained his unqualified support was given to Van Dam and his statements, if they were not bluff, showed that he believed the cause would triumph in England.³ Some rather strong expressions were used in Zenger's "Journal," but when the time came for swearing in the city officials, those whom Clarke had continued in office took the oaths without opposition.

On October 13, just as the assembly was meeting and after it had spent a day before organizing in debating the legality of Clarke's position, he received from England an additional instruction prescribing a change in the form of prayer to be used for the royal family. It was opened before the council, and members of the assembly were at once made acquainted with its arrival. On the strength of it the house organized and Clarke made the customary opening speech.⁴ He set before them the need of revenue to support the government and make good arrears, for the repair and improvement of Oswego and the other defences on the frontier, the desirability of encouraging ship building and the production of hemp and other commodities which would be valuable as exports

¹ Minutes of Common Council of N. Y., IV, 276, 347.

² Ibid., 345-351; Ex. C. Minutes, Sept. 30-Oct. 6, 1736; Smith, II, 28, 30.

³ N. Y. Docs. VI, 85 et seq.

⁴ Ass. J. I, 689; N. Y. Docs. VI, 85, 86.

to Great Britain. Ten rather unimportant acts were passed,¹ but none of them of the character which Clarke most desired. Though they contained no provision for a revenue, he signed them all and relied on promises that due provision would be made next session. He wrote to the board that he had drawn no warrants since those which fell due on June 1. Before this session closed Clarke received his commission as lieutenant governor and all doubt as to his position was removed.² Though Van Dam continued to utter idle threats, the faction, as such, was at once reduced to silence, and it was due to this news that promises were made concerning appropriations at the next session.

But though the controversy, in the form which it had assumed in Cosby's administration, was now closed, the leaders of the opposition were still active in the assembly and outside. They were also resolved to raise questions which had been at rest since Hunter's time and to use their power to win further concessions from the executive. In May, 1736, Clarke wrote that during the past two sessions one of the great objects of the opponents of the government had been to secure the dissolution of the existing assembly, and then they would pass only annual appropriation bills.³ If they gained a majority in the next election, they would not even make annual appropriations without further concessions.

Among these would be the establishment of a court of chancery by statute, the passage of an act declaring that judges should hold during good behavior, and the passage of a triennial act. They would also limit and reduce the fees of all officials and, with that and a system of annual salaries, they would make the entire executive subordinate to themselves. During the troubles of Cosby's administration the assembly had been quiescent and the contest had been fought out in the council and the courts. Now the assembly came again to the front, questions of revenue and appropriation assumed chief prominence, and by means of these the settlement which had existed since Hunter's time was overthrown. A new period of conflict over fiscal questions was inaugurated, which resulted in important changes of balance between the assembly and the executive. With these Clarke was occupied during nearly all of his administration, and under the changed relations of war they were revived in the time of his successor.

¹ N. Y. Docs. VI, 87-88.

² Ass. J. I, 692; N. Y. Docs. VI, 84.

³ N. Y. Docs., VI, 63.

When the assembly met for the spring session of 1737, the sufferings of Clarke from lack of support had become intense. No salary had been appropriated to him and he had been obliged to support the honor and dignity of the government out of his own moderate fortune.¹ In his speech at the beginning of the session he forcibly stated, that the treasurer's account showed a deficit which arose from insufficient funds and that speedy provision for this was expected.² Also, he added, the expiration of the time for which revenue had been voted was at hand and its continuance he desired. On April 27 the committee on the governor's speech, through its chairman, Lewis Morris, Jr., reported upon the deficit and the way in which they proposed to meet it until the first of the following September.³ By examining the treasurer's accounts they found how much was expected to accrue until that date and what debts of the province would fall due by that time. They then selected from the total number of claims those which they chose to pay and ordered a bill prepared for that purpose. By this means they excluded a certain number of claims, among them being those for the wages of the clerk and doorkeeper of the council and for one-half of Clarke's salary. But the point which most offended Clarke in this procedure was this, that it was done wholly without the intervention of warrants signed by the governor with the advice of the council. It involved the appropriation of revenue by bill to the exclusion of the executive and apparently without the possibility of having it accounted for to the crown through the auditor general. This was contrary to instructions and modified the method of appropriating which was recognized in the laws of the province. It was to prevent such complete subjection to the power of the assembly as this procedure implied that the government in Hunter's time had gone for years without support. Clarke, risking like fate, dissolved the assembly.

¹ N. Y. Docs. VI, 89

² Ass. J. I, 695.

³ Ibid., 9; N. Y. Docs. VI, 94.

In the election which immediately followed the country party easily won. Both the Morrisses were returned from Westchester and Alexander, though a member of the council, was elected from New York City. The younger Morris was chosen speaker. A first and unimportant session was held in June, which was brought to an early close by the necessity of the governor visiting Albany for a conference with the Indians. The next session began in September and proved to be one of great importance.¹ The governor, in a conciliatory speech, brought before the legislature the customary needs of the province.

"The deficiencies of the revenue, under which the officers of the government and their creditors groan," said the governor, "call for your early attention, and from your justice and honor I hope to see speedy and ample provision made for them." In anticipation of coming encroachments, however, he announced that he should obey instructions and maintain the prerogative, while he protected all subjects in the full enjoyment of their rights and liberties.

The attitude of this assembly on the question now at issue between it and the executive was explained in an elaborate address, which it prepared in reply to the governor's speech, and which was intended also for use in England.² The measures which were insisted on in the beginning as necessary to liberty and security were: the need of free and frequent elections, though they acknowledged that the late elections had been totally free from executive interference; the necessity of basing the courts and their spheres of action on statutes, a practice which was believed to be allowable under royal instructions but which later governors had departed from to the dissatisfaction of the people and disturbance of the province; that fees should be strictly limited by law, for if they rested on ordinance it was taking property without consent. Passing to the criticism of governors, they observed that the conduct of some of these, who had been "buoyed up and bloated with the fulsome addresses and servile flatteries of the instruments of their misrule," had not been "very becoming the representatives of a British monarch governing a free people." They supposed that all the requirements of the crown would be fit and reasonable, if set forth with candor, but the practices of such governors as they had in mind were destructive at once of true prerogative and of the liberty of the people. Instructions, they continued, are "prudential directions to regulate the conduct of a governor" in the exercise of his powers, and they should be as laws to him. But governors had violated them with impunity or heeded them only so far as they thought proper or as it suited their particular ends.

¹ Ass. J. I, 704 et seq.

² Ass. J. I, 706. Smith's account of Clarke's administration is in Vol. II, 33-67.

The homily on governors served as an introduction to the treatment of revenue and deficits. Had their loyalty met with suitable treatment from the executive, they asked Clarke to believe that they would have been lavish beyond their abilities. But the miserable condition to which the conduct of governors had reduced the province made the raising of large sums difficult, if not impracticable. "You are not to expect that we will either raise sums unfit to be raised, or put what we shall raise into the power of a governor to misapply, if we can prevent it, nor shall we make up any other deficiencies than what we conceive are fit and just to be paid, or continue what support or revenue we shall raise for any longer time than one year; nor do we think it convenient to do even that until such laws are passed as we conceive necessary for the safety of the inhabitants of this colony, who have reposed a trust in us for that only purpose, and which we are sure you think it reasonable we should act agreeable to, and by the grace of God we will endeavor not to deceive them." There is certainly no more forcible declaration in colonial annals of the resolve of an assembly to control the public purse than this. It was followed in the course of this and later sessions by appropriate action.

Clarke received the address amicably, assuring them that he would assent to bills for frequent elections, or regulating elections, or promoting in any way the good of the province, if he could do so consistently with his duty to the crown. To this submissiveness he was brought by absolute need of revenue. The extent to which the opposition might try to go had already been indicated by a motion of James Alexander for leave to bring in a bill to vacate the seats of representatives in the assembly who should accept any office, gift or grant from the governor or commander-in-chief. Leave was given, though the motion applied to Alexander himself, who was a member of the council.¹ Soon the question came up, whether he should be allowed to retain his seat in the assembly. But on his declaring that he had not acted as a councillor since his election as a representative and would not so act during the continuance of the assembly, it was unanimously resolved that he should retain his seat.

Meantime a notable case of disputed election had arisen. Garret Van Horne, a member of the opposition and former representative from New York city, had died and his son, Cornelius, had run for his seat. Adolph Philipse, late speaker, was the government candidate.² After a hotly contested election Philipse, who was a non-resident, was returned by sheriff Cosby. But Van Horne petitioned the assembly that the case between him and Philipse might be heard before the latter was admitted to a seat. With this came also a petition, signed by a large number of New Yorkers, complaining of the unjust conduct of sheriffs in the recent election there. The assembly resolved that neither of the contesting candidates should be seated until the alleged partiality of sheriffs had been inquired into. William Smith, who had been forbidden to practice at the bar, appeared for Van Horne, but in opposition to his demands the supporters of Philipse carried a motion for a scrutiny of the votes. It was the vote of Alexander in the negative on this motion that occasioned the inquiry into his right to a seat in the assembly, with the result already stated. Van Horne and Cosby were both heard and then the court party won another victory by the passage of a motion that Cosby had not so misbehaved himself on election day as to invalidate the election. It being found, on examining the lists of electors, that some Jews had voted for Philipse, Smith raised the question whether or not they were qualified. Murray, counsel for Philipse, briefly argued in the affirmative, because the law mentioned all freeholders of competent estates. But Smith, though without special preparation, launched out upon a prolonged argument against the right of Jews to vote, based upon the policy of England toward them and on their crucifixion of Jesus.¹ This argument produced a deep impression and resulted in the rejection of the vote of Jews and a resolution, "That they ought not to be admitted to vote for representatives in this colony."² With this was also associated the question, whether or not non-resident freeholders had a right to vote. This was decided in the affirmative, though Alexander and his friends had advanced the idea, which was ultimately to prevail, that personal residence was as necessary to the exercise of the suffrage as possession of a freehold. The result of scrutiny was the seating of Philipse,³ while soon after, through the mediation of the governor, Smith and Alexander were restored to the right to practice law and all charges against them were dismissed.

¹ Ass. J. I, 705, 711.

² Ass. J.I, 710; Smith, II, 37.

With the accession of Clarke to office the governor ceased to sit in council when it was in legislative session, and it then began to have a speaker of its own.⁴ Abraham Van Horne and Cadwallader Colden were the first incumbents of this office. As befitting this change, the chamber of the common council in the city hall was assigned for the use of the council when in its legislative sessions.⁵ During this session the council began the practice — of which there were only three such instances before — of sending messages to the assembly by its clerk or deputy clerk; but the assembly absolutely refused to communicate in this way. The innovation was therefore abandoned and the council resumed the former practice of sending communications by one of its members.⁶

The council, under these somewhat more independent conditions, showed considerable activity in opposing or amending favorite measures of the other house. Because of the opposition of the council, a bill for the appointment of an agent by the assembly alone was dropped. Bills for the regulation of election and of fees, and to prevent corruption at elections, met with a similar fate. In conferences between the two

¹ Smith was a diligent student of the Bible and of Puritan theology.

² Ass. J. I, 712.

³ Ibid., 717.

⁴ Min. of Leg. C., I, 661 et seq.

⁵ Ibid., 665, 666; Ass. J. I, 691.

⁶ C. J. I, 687 et seq.; Ass. J. I, 717, 718.

houses the bill for triennial elections was amended by the insertion of a clause permitting the governor, for good reason and on the advice of the council, to call the assembly to meet in some other place than New York City. This act provided for annual sessions and that no assembly should continue in existence for more than three years.¹ The argument which was chiefly used in support of this measure was that neighboring colonies—meaning especially Pennsylvania and Connecticut—where elections and sessions of assemblies were frequent, were rapidly filling up with settlers; people were leaving New York for these colonies, and as a result town and country property and rents were falling in value. This was deemed especially serious, because New York was a frontier province; and inherently there was no reason why it should be so, because the soil of New York was rich and it had better facilities than any other colony for inland trade and ocean navigation. The fact that this act was not aimed at Clarke is shown by the earnest desire of the assembly that he would support it in his letters home.² It embodied a cardinal principle of the opposition since the time of Zenger and would have worked a notable change in the political conditions of New York. But it was disapproved by the board of trade and disallowed by the privy council, on the ground that it took away the undoubted right of the executive to continue an assembly as long as it thought necessary.

At this session also a step forward was taken in the regulation of courts, by an act establishing and specifying the jurisdiction of local courts for trying cases involving forty shillings and under. Provision was also made, in an elaborate act, for meeting the contingent charges of the garrison at

¹ C. J. 691, 693, 694, 696, 698; Ass. J. I, 720 et seq.; Colonial Laws II, 951; N. Y. Docs. VI, 112, 113, 130, 136. It was naturally the desire of the opposition to tie the assembly to New York City, where its strength was greatest. The same feeling existed in reference to Boston, and one may surmise that the controversy in which Burnet had been engaged a few years before over the same question in Massachusetts was known to the leaders of the New York assembly.

² After the bill had been for some time before the home government, Clarke wrote that he was aware there was no great probability of its being accepted. "What I wrote was purely on the pressing instances of the Assembly." N. Y. Docs. VI, 135.

Oswego. The appropriation for this purpose was made for three years, and the revenue for it was to be derived from a duty on cloths and liquors used in the Indian trade. Commissioners for managing and collecting the duties were named in the act, and some of the strict regulations which were imposed were apparently borrowed from the legislation of Burnet against trade with Canada. The Indian trade at Oswego was also carefully regulated, as was the amount which could be expended on the repair of the fort. The requirements for vouchers and audit were also strict, and in every way those who drafted the act labored to eliminate executive discretion.¹

In accepting these bills the governor was making concessions in order that he might secure adequate appropriations for salaries and current expenses, and to pay the debts of the province. But he was able to secure this only in the form of an act for the issue of bills of credit to the additional amount of £48,350,² and also laws making specific appropriations and granting the usual revenue or duties on imports for one year only. The act for the issue of bills of credit he defended, on the ground that it furnished the only means of discharging the public debts; but going further than that, he made a notable argument in favor of bills of credit, thus placing himself in the growing list of governors who were becoming converts to that view of the subject. He said that specie flowed steadily out of New York, that the rate of interest was consequently high, while the paper from neighboring colonies took the place which the occasional issues of New York failed to fill. Under the influence of the new issue the rate of interest was falling, and Clarke hoped that trade and industry would improve. As to the fiscal system of New York in general, the merchants had long complained because land taxes had been discontinued, owing to the influence of the country members, and the chief burden of supporting the government had fallen upon trade.

These bills Clarke was glad to accept as a relief from suffering, though they curtailed his power. But he bore in mind the hope that, in order to redeem the £20,000 in bills of credit which had long been outstanding, an excise would have to be reimposed in 1739 or soon after, and that in connection with this levy he would be able to secure appropriations again for a period of years.¹ "I must not too much rely on that expedient," he continued, "but make use of it in conjunction with other things, to win them to like measures that former assemblies have taken. . . ." Time and good management on the part of the governor effectually removed the active spirit of hostility toward the executive which had existed in the time of Cosby. Judicious appointments contributed to this result. Lewis Morris, the elder, was well advanced in years and was now wholly removed from New York and its assembly by his appointment as governor of New Jersey. In the next session of the assembly Alexander was found usually voting on the side of the governor.

¹ Col. Laws, II, 964, 994.

² Ibid., 1015, 1036, 1047; N. Y. Docs. VI, 116.

But this does not mean that the assembly abandoned the ground it had won or ceased to strive for more; but the process went on without violence. In his speech at the opening of the fall session of 1738 Clarke declared that more than a year had passed since the last grant of support for the government was made. The funds for redeeming the bills of credit which had been issued in 1714 and 1717, he continued, were now about £17,000 in arrears and provision for them would wholly expire next year. He knew that the assembly would deem it important to secure these bills and, as previously stated, he took advantage of this to secure, if possible, a restoration of appropriations for a longer period. He told the house that he would assent to the continuance of the excise, if it would give as ample a revenue and for as long a time as earlier assemblies had done. In the course of the session, in the hope of spurring them on, he laid before them a report that the French intended soon to make settlements near Wood Creek at the head of Lake Champlain and were negotiating with the Indians to secure a post at Irondequoit, on the south shore of Lake Ontario. About 200 Scotch immigrants had just arrived, and the governor urged that steps be taken to settle them near Wood Creek, and that presents be made to the Senecas to induce them to break off negotiations with the French.¹ But these efforts of his made little or no impression on the house.

¹ Ibid., 111, 112. The bills of credit referred to were issued in 1714 and 1717.

Bills were introduced at the beginning of the session to regulate and establish fees and to regulate the election of representatives to the assembly. The house also made it one of its standing rules of order, that the names of all who voted aye or nay on resolutions passed in the grand committees should be entered in the journal, and also the names of those who declined to vote. This made proceedings better defined and sharpened the responsibility of members.² When it came to resolutions on supply, they were made, if possible, more specific than ever before, aye and nay votes being taken on the salaries of the governor, justices, and treasurer. The same procedure was followed in fixing the rates of duty in the revenue bill, and it was carefully limited to one year.³

It was the plan of the assembly to tack to the bill for the support of the government for one year a clause providing for the continuance of the bills of credit. When the governor heard of this, he summoned the speaker and told him that he could not assent to such a measure, for it was contrary to the 12th instruction, which forbade the combining of different subjects in the same law. After considering this message, the house unanimously resolved not to grant any money for the support of the government without an assurance that the bills issued in 1714 and 1717, and the excise act, should be continued for a sufficient time after November, 1739, to redeem the bills. The governor replied, that he could not assent to such a bill unless the house would grant support for as long a time and in as ample manner as had been given to former governors; neither could he consent to the appropriation of the money. They had, he said, a large sum of paper out, which next year would be without a fund to redeem it. It would no longer pass and hundreds of people must lose by it. He had offered to continue redeeming it if they would grant a revenue for a term of years, as had been customary since 1690. But what they had resolved upon and adhered to was so daring and unprecedented that he at once dissolved them.⁴ The board of trade fully approved of

¹ Ass. J. I, 735, 740, 742.

² Ibid., 741, 743.

³ Ibid., 742, 744.

⁴ Ibid., 747; N. Y. Docs. VI, 139.

his course. "You certainly have acted as became you, both in communicating your instruction to them and in adhering to it yourself," was their comment.

Though the election which followed, in March 1738/9, gave additional proof that the anti-Cosby faction was virtually extinct, so that Adolph Philipse was chosen speaker in place of Lewis Morris, Jr., yet the assembly which was brought together was as alert as ever against executive demands. Owing to the ravages of the smallpox in New York City, its first session (April, 1739) was held at Greenwich Village and was brief. Of the two acts passed, the one of importance was the extension of the law for the support of the governor for one year longer. They had been deaf to the governor's arguments and he had to accept the bill.¹ In his letter to the board of trade Clarke gave this statement of the meaning which the assembly attached to the word "appropriation": "to assume to themselves the power in the revenue bill to ascertain every officer's salary and to apply and issue the money they give to those very officers and uses and no other; thereby making the governor and every officer in this government dependent on them alone and wresting from the governor the right of issuing the money. . . . as hath hitherto been done with advice of the council, pursuant to the king's instructions. They have for above twenty years, upon their giving a revenue, ascertained every officer's salary in their votes, and the governors have very seldom in issuing the money varied it. But now they would go a step further and in effect assume to themselves all power, that is to designate not only what should go to the support of government but what should be used for other purposes." Clarke had not opposed this, though he supposed the board would think he ought to have done so.

Because the smallpox had not entirely disappeared, the fall session² was held at Hermanus Rutgers' house near the Fresh Water (The Collect). Ignoring for the most part the governor's recommendations, the house resumed its usual course, calling for the accounts of the treasurer under the various revenue acts, calling for the amounts which the loan offices had paid into the treasury under the act for emitting bills of credit, for the accounts of the vendue master and of the various commissioners who had been named by itself to superintend the erection of a battery and other defences at New York, a stone fort at Albany, a fort at Schenectady, and to have charge of the post at Oswego. These accounts were duly rendered. It was at this time that Laughlin Campbell and others petitioned on behalf of the families of Highland Scotch who had landed at New York and desired to settle near Wood Creek, but the land desired was deemed no longer available because of a prior grant to the late Governor Cosby. A report, however, appears to have been circulated that the obstacle in Campbell's way was a demand on the part of Clarke and Colden, the surveyor general, that they should share in the grant and the fees for making it. Clarke also saw that they were trying to cut his own salary in half (to £780) on the plea that he was only a lieutenant governor; also that they were going to issue more bills of credit and make inadequate appropriations for the various works of defence which were in process of construction.¹

¹ Ass. J. I, 752, 754; N. Y. Docs., VI, 141.

² Ass. J. I, 756 et seq.

In the hope of bringing the house to a better mind, on October 3d, Clarke gave it a recess for six days and advised its members to copy the example of parliament, which gave a gross sum for the civil list and did not seek to determine its application, that being within the power of the crown. But this produced no effect. The appropriations for forts which had already been decided upon were adhered to, and on October 25 the governor accepted them, as well as an act for the issue of additional bills of credit. Clarke's assent to this last bill, for which he had to excuse himself to the board of trade on the ground that by this means he secured appropriations for defence, also resulted in a grant to him of a salary of £1300 for an additional year.² He wrote to the board that he had used all possible means to bring the assembly to the desired appropriation, but in vain. They knew that the country unanimously agreed with them and that the members were assured of reelection. Because also of the prospect of a rupture with Spain and France, they felt sure that Clarke would lay hold on the present session to put the province in a state of defence. They were also confirmed in their views by the fact that in the previous winter Governor Morris, of New Jersey, had assented to a revenue bill with specific appropriations. Clarke consulted the council, and it was unanimously of the opinion that this was not the proper time to dissolve. The members of the council who at that time were the most regular in attendance were Kennedy, DeLancey, Van Cortlandt, Lane and Horsmanden, all of whom lived in town. Van Dam and Alexander had not been removed, but Clarke had not summoned them, inasmuch as the board of trade at the close of Cosby's administration had reported them as unfit to serve. Colden was much of the time in the country and Livingston lived at Albany. Van Horne pleaded ill health as an excuse for continued absence.

¹ Ibid., 761, 768, 783; N. Y. Docs. VI, 147, 150; VII, 629; Smith, II, 49, 50; and Colden in Colls. of N. Y. Hist. Soc. Fund Series, 1868, p. 229, in correction of Smith.

² Ass. J. I, 768; Col. Laws, III, chaps. 675, 676, 678; N. Y. Docs., VI, 150, 151, 160.

With the outbreak of the war against Spain and the expedition of 1740 to the West Indies, attention was diverted largely to military affairs and special appropriations for defence. But at the opening of the spring session of 1741 Clarke, in a long speech, again brought forward the question of legislative encroachment.¹ He reviewed the history of the encroachments of the assembly, the origin of the treasurership and of specific appropriations, and the extension of the control of the treasurer from the revenue for extraordinary purposes to the entire revenue, a change which involved the extinction of the salary of the auditor general from New York. By this departure from the practice of parliament, he claimed that they had aroused suspicion that the colonies had thoughts of throwing off dependence on the crown. In the truth of this he expressed no belief, but preferred to attribute the course of the assembly to wantonness caused by prosperity. Then he passed to the immediate necessity of defence and, to prove his impotence, declared: "At present, if any part of the province should be invaded and money be absolutely necessary for any service, even in such an exigency I cannot, either with or without the advice of the council, draw for a penny; a circumstance well worth your consideration."

¹ Ass. J. I, 792, 797, 799, 810.

In its equally elaborate reply the house disclaimed all the sinister motives which were attributed to it, and explained its own course and that of its predecessors in the matter solely as a reaction against the "misapplication" of revenue, especially in the time of Cornbury. They dwelt upon the beneficent results which had followed, in the form of certainty of payments in definitely ascertained sums instead of general favoritism and uncertainty, with large numbers of warrants remaining unpaid for years or in fact never being paid at all. Instead of admitting the distinction between extraordinary grants and stated revenue, to which Clarke had called their attention, they sought to define revenue as including only the quit rents and permanent dues of the crown, all of which passed through the hands of the receiver general, while all moneys granted by assemblies were temporary grants and hence, according to the governor's definition, fell properly under the control of the treasurer. This was a novel view, not in harmony with the distinction drawn in the past, and was evidently contrived to fit the situation as it had actually come to exist. And as to the auditor general, whose dues from New York had long remained unpaid, the house cited evidence that he had never received anything from Massachusetts, and expressed the opinion that the salary he received in England was probably sufficient for his support. The assembly was so completely master of the situation that all Clarke could do, when their last address was presented, was to receive it with a silent bow.¹ The discussion was not resumed during the two remaining years of his administration.

¹ Smith, II, 63.

CHAPTER VI

IMMIGRATION INTO THE AMERICAN COLONIES DURING THE FIRST HALF OF THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY

OF the two terms, colonization and immigration, the former is the more comprehensive. It includes the entire process which results in the establishment of dependencies, namely, the occupation of the soil, the transfer and natural growth of population, the establishment of trade relations, the development of political supremacy and of all the institutions which accompany this growth. Immigration, or emigration, is only one step, though a very important one, in this process. It refers to the transfer of colonists from the parent state or other, and usually older, communities to the territory which is being colonized. It may result in the removal of masses of population from one country to another without a corresponding transfer of sovereignty, the immigrants changing their nationality by naturalization. During the past half-century this process has been illustrated on a vast scale in the history of the United States. It also assumed considerable dimensions in the eighteenth century. Many other instances of the same kind could be cited and the difference between them and colonization, in the accepted meaning of that term, is evident.

The British-American colonies were settled by a process of immigration. This formed an important part of the colonizing activity of that time. Under the conditions of resources, knowledge and transportation which then existed, the removal of a considerable body of people from their ancient homes to a wilderness across the ocean was no easy task. No single motive or impulse was sufficient, but a variety of conditions which made life hard in the old world and made it appear to be much easier in the new had to combine to produce the result. Among these in England were congested conditions of population in many localities occasioned by laws of settlement, changes in methods of agriculture, disbandment of soldiers who had long been absent in wars on the continent, crime, religious intolerance, wars and general misgovernment. These gave rise to certain phenomena resembling over-population, but not in fact to excessive numbers in the kingdom as a whole. What was needed was a better distribution and far more elastic conditions within the economic organism. As soon as the way for the founding of colonies was opened the push of motives, like the desire for profit and betterment and the love of adventure, made themselves felt. Religious zeal and the desire to escape from restraints of various kinds at home played an important part. Viewed from this standpoint, emigration involved some of the elements of an emancipation. The spirit of the Protestant Revolt found an outlet in this direction, and in its initial stages the movement was closely connected with the struggle against Spain, as well as that against the restraints of ecclesiastical policy at home.

But such motives as these could operate unaided and effectively upon those only who had the means to pay for the passage across the ocean and to secure a comfortable establishment in the colonies. For a large proportion of those who became colonists this was impossible and for them some form of aided emigration was necessary. Advertising and the provision of means of transportation and settlement were likewise needed for all. These were provided by the companies and proprietors who initiated the movement. They were set forth in part in the conditions of plantation. Cheap land and the prospect of gain from the production of colonial staples and trade therein soon became the chief and most persistent attractions for those who were tempted to removal. But the poorer class, who were to form the mass of field laborers and artisans in the colonies, did not possess the six to ten pounds per head which was required for passage money. They had therefore to pledge their labor and that of their families, if they had any, for years in advance in order to secure transportation. These advances were made by well-to-do planters, merchants or ship captains on the security of a bill of indenture. The government, both of the realm and of towns, became interested in this form of traffic as a means of relief from a part of their poor or worthless and criminal population. Kidnapping also, especially of women and children, under the name of "spiriting," was practiced on a considerable scale. Under the barbarous criminal code which then existed the substituting for a death sentence one of transportation beyond the seas often seemed a desirable act of mercy even to judges and other officials. The transportation of many rebels after the suppression of unsuccessful efforts at insurrection was another common practice. By all these methods combined the mass of indentured servants, known in part as "redemptioners" and in part also as "free-willers," were procured and brought into the British-American colonies. They were crowded upon small vessels, without sanitation, with poor and inadequate food, exposed to the sufferings, fears and diseases of a long ocean voyage. Those who survived and reached the American coast, if they were not already bound to a permanent master, were sold into years of servitude. As a result of a variety of offences or mishaps this period might be prolonged and in the course of it the servant might pass under the sway of a succession of masters. The servant had his rights and his standing before the law and the courts; at the close of his service he had the prospect of fifty acres of land and some part of an outfit; freedom was the goal at the end, with the prospect, in multitudes of cases fully realized, of rising to an honorable place in society. And yet, while it lasted, the position of the indentured servant was a hard one and as such was a true expression of the narrow and inhuman conditions which existed in the centuries of which we are speaking.¹

The system of white servitude existed in all the colonies, but it prevailed to the greatest extent in Pennsylvania and the tobacco-growing regions of the Lower Counties, Maryland and Virginia. It was to this belt that the largest body of immigrants came, and the indentured servant represented the chief form of assisted emigration both from the United ¹ A literature of considerable extent and much interest exists on this subject. Reference need be made here only to two monographs, one by Ballagh and the other by McCormac in the J. H. U. Studies. The former of these is on White Servitude in Virginia and the latter on White Servitude in Maryland. See also the chapters on the System of Labor in Bruce's Econ. History of Va. Diffenderfer's volume on the Redemptioners relates to the Germans in Pennsylvania.

Kingdom and the continent of Europe. To the north of this section the system of free labor prevailed and to the south negro slavery proved to be better adapted to the climate. In much of the region south of the Potomac river, before the eighteenth century was far advanced, slave labor was held to have proved its economic superiority to that of whites in any form, and white servitude, except temporarily in Georgia, had begun to decline.

Since the main purpose of this work is to explain the nature and growth of government in the American colonies, the fact of immigration has hitherto been taken for granted. The land and the people, the two fundamental elements of the state, have been assumed to be in existence without an attempt to discuss their characteristics in detail. But the point has now been reached where some account must be taken of the process of immigration, with special reference to the distribution of national stocks within the colonial areas and to the extension of settlement. This extension of settled territory was due not simply to the increase of population already in the colonies, but to immigration on a considerable scale. English, Dutch and Swedes were the chief components of the people who, prior to 1690, had settled in small and detached communities along the Atlantic seaboard, and the governments which they established all conformed to a few fundamental types. They were in every case the reflection of the feudal-monarchical institutions which existed in all the parent states of Europe, and their varieties served as additional illustrations of that type. Moreover, the Swedes were very soon subdued by the Dutch and the Dutch in turn by the British, and the process of social amalgamation then went on under the general control of the dominant nationality and into a certain conformity with its institutions. New England was almost exclusively English. So was Virginia, and to a less extent Maryland and the Carolinas. This, of course, does not exclude the truth of the claim that individuals and families belonging to other nationalities, especially Scotch and Irish, were to be found in these communities. But after all allowances are made, it still remains true that New England and the Southern colonies in the seventeenth century were overwhelmingly English. This was not true of the colonies along the Delaware and Hudson rivers. Welsh appeared prominently among the early settlers of Pennsylvania, while in the Lower Counties the Swedes and Dutch, and upon both the upper and lower Hudson the Dutch, established a permanent and controlling influence. These stocks left no decided impress on the political institutions, but in matters of dress, education, religion and social customs their characteristics survived until comparatively recent times, or in some cases have become a permanent part of our national inheritance.

Even before 1690 a difference had thus been established between the middle colonies and those which lay to the north and south of them. This was to be further emphasized in the eighteenth century and to go far in the end to determine the character of our national development. England itself is a country whose population is so mixed in origin as to constitute a standing puzzle for ethnologists. With the addition of the Welsh, the Irish and the Scotch-Irish the complexity of social origins and characteristics was greatly increased. In 1707, by the Act of Union, Scotland, too, was brought completely within the fold, and after that date the term British is properly used to indicate that the English had become only a part of a larger complex whole. Emigration from Great Britain and Ireland to the colonies necessarily reflected the mixture of racial stocks which appears in the populations from which it came. The colonies therefore, and afterwards the United States, became in a way a reflex of the population of the parent state.

But, from the first, emigrants from the continent of Europe obtained a foothold within this colonial area. They arrived contemporaneously with the British. Though they were forced to submit to the political sway of Great Britain, they did not and could not wholly surrender their national characteristics. From the first a certain French element appeared among the American colonists. This consisted of Protestants who, under the pressure of hostile edicts, and when the religious wars began, considered it safer to leave their country. Coligny's experiments in Brazil and at Port Royal and the early participation of Huguenots in the colonization of Acadia, Canada and the West Indies are well known instances of an activity which involved possibilities of vast over-sea expansion for France. But the Huguenots in the end were wholly excluded from this, while a policy of repression was adopted which ended in wholesale emigration from France and exclusion from French colonies. They found a refuge in all the neighboring Protestant countries, including England and the Netherlands. With them in the Netherlands were associated Protestants from the Belgic provinces, of Walloon and Flemish origin, who had fled into Holland to escape Spanish persecution at the beginning of the seventeenth century and earlier. These same Dutch provinces were also the asylum to which Puritans fled from England in the reigns of Elizabeth and James I. When New Netherland was settled a not unimportant part of its population were Walloons or Flemish who spoke French and bore French names. This was the origin of the Bayards, DeForests, La Montagnes and Rapelies who were prominent for so long in New York. French Protestants and even some Waldenses shared also in the emigration to this Dutch province, some settling on the middle course of the Hudson as well as about New Amsterdam.

As the policy which led to the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes was developed and after the decree had actually been issued, a general flight occurred from all parts of France where Huguenot worship existed. Brittany and the region of La Rochelle, Normandy, Saintonge, Poitou, Guienne, Languedoc, Picardy and the Ile de France were the districts chiefly affected. As in the previous century England had offered a refuge to Flemish fugitives, it now welcomed the French, some of whom found a permanent home in London, Bristol and elsewhere. But a large part of those who sought an English asylum found it in the American colonies, some obtaining letters of denization before they crossed the Atlantic. It was in this way, during the later years of the seventeenth century that a most valuable, though not numerically large, element was added to the population especially of New York, Massachusetts and South Carolina.¹ In the first mentioned colony New York City and New Rochelle received the larger part of these immigrants; in Massachusetts they settled chiefly in Boston, in Salem and in Oxford in Worcester County; in South Carolina they settled in Charlestown and on the Santee river. Trade and commerce were their chief pursuits and during the three generations which followed their arrival they contributed some of the most distinguished names to the catalogue of American public men. Manigault, Boudoin (Bowdoin), Faneuil, Pintard, Jay, Bernon and Boudinot came from La Rochelle or its vicinity, DeLancey from Normandy, Le Conte from Rouen, Elias Prioleau and Elias Neau from Saintonge, Mascarene from near Toulouse, Minvielle from Guienne. This body of immigrants was not large — numbering only a few thousands — neither did it settle any special areas of territory or form a distinct political element among the population. In both religion and politics the French combined easily with their British neighbors. They settled near the seacoast and thus mingled with the population by which the colonies had originally been planted. But their high average of morality and intelligence, as well as the distinction which was attained by a number of leaders among them, especially during the American Revolution, not only proved their value as an element in the population of the British colonies, but indicates the difference there would have been in the fortunes of America had they and their compatriots been permitted to migrate to Canada and the Mississippi valley.

¹ For the history of the Huguenot Emigration to America the standard authority is the work of Dr. Charles W. Baird. See also Weiss, History of the French Protestant Refugees.

As the eighteenth century progressed, one of the most important features of our colonial development was not only the natural growth of population on the soil but immigration from Europe which filled up many of the open spaces near the coast and pushed settlement westward to the mountains. It affected colonial life in many ways, political as well as social, and caused the situation of affairs after about 1750 to differ materially from that which preceded. It strengthened the impression, already given in the seventeenth century, that not the United Kingdom but all Europe and even Africa were to be parents of America, and even of that part of it which lies between the St. Lawrence and the Gulf of Mexico. The immigration of the eighteenth century is therefore a subject germane to the purpose of this work.

The influx of Germans, beginning about 1710, first demands attention. Notwithstanding the brilliant achievements of the Hanseatic and Rhenish cities in trade and the full share which Germany bore in the literary and scientific triumphs of the Renaissance, as a people the Germans took no part in the discovery or exploration of the Americas. The connection of Charles V with the Empire might naturally have committed the Germans to later plans of colonization, but these were limited to grants by him, in return for loans to the Welsers and Fuggers, the great merchants and bankers of Augsburg, of large territories and rights of trade in South America. The grant to the Welsers included the modern Venezuela and that to the Fuggers the southern part of the continent, including Paraguay and Chile. This occurred about 1530 and the only settlements made by Germans were in the northern grant.¹ As was the case with England after the voyages of the Cabots, religious disturbances and wars consequent on the Protestant Revolt soon diverted the attention of Germans from American enterprise. But unlike England, the course of later events, combined with political and geographical conditions, prevented Germany from ever resuming the work of discovery and colonization overseas. On the abdication of Charles V, Spain, and with it the Indies, fell to Philip II. The Empire, ever growing weaker, was too loosely organized to promote any concerted national effort. At the beginning of the seventeenth century, when England as well as France and the Dutch began in earnest their careers as trading and colonizing powers, Germany was devastated by the Thirty Years War. This not only completed the ruin of the Empire as a political fabric, but many parts of the country were so devastated by the robber hordes, into which the contending armies degenerated, that generations and even centuries passed before they recovered even to the degree of prosperity which had existed at the close of the sixteenth century. The victorious invasions of the French under Turenne in the later years of the war were especially destructive in southwestern Germany. But the Thirty Years War proved to be the beginning rather than the end of disasters of this kind. With the reign of Louis XIV in France began the territorial and dynastic wars of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, an important feature of which was the policy of réunion, the term used to designate the annexation of Imperial lands to the French monarchy. Beginning with 1673 and continuing at intervals until the peace of Utrecht in 1713, many or all of the territories along the Rhine were repeatedly devastated by French armies, towns destroyed, fields laid waste and masses of the people left to destitution and beggary. The Rhenish Palatinate suffered most from these visitations, the worst of which occurred during the early years of the war of the League of Augsburg (1689-1697). In religion that territory had become first Lutheran and then Reformed, but beginning with 1690 the new Elector, John William, who was a fanatical Catholic, sought to force his subjects to return to the ancient faith. This occasioned conflicts and acts of oppression which added greatly to the sufferings of the people. The unsettled religious conditions continued far into the eighteenth century, while ravages of French armies were repeated during the struggles over the Austrian succession. The neighboring principalities of Würtemberg and Baden suffered in much the same way, while all the territories of southwestern Germany were grossly misgoverned by their petty princes, who were faithful imitators of the French court and of the fiscal and military exactions to which French absolutism gave rise. These were the conditions which prevented Germany as a nation from sharing in the colonization of America.¹

¹ Sachse, The Fatherland, in Proc. of Pa. German Soc. VII.

Not a few Germans, however, had found their way into the colonies from the beginning, and had settled chiefly among the Dutch and Swedes. The careers of Peter Minuit, from Wesel, and Jacob Leisler, from Frankfort, bear witness to this fact. The well known journeys of William Penn to the continent, especially when aided by the efforts of the Rotterdam merchant, Benjamin Furley,² spread broadcast in western ¹ These facts find illustration at any length in the standard histories of Germany. They will be found brought into connection with the emigration of Germans to America, in the writings of Sachse and the other members of the Pa. German Society; in Kuhns, German and Swiss Settlements in Pennsylvania; and in F. Kapp, Die Deutschen im Staate, New York. An earlier but still suggestive account is by Löhr, Geschichte und Zustände der Deutschen in America, 1885. The best general treatment of the whole subject is by Faust, The German Element in the United States.

² Sachse, German Pietists of Pa., 433 et seq., Pa. Mag. of Hist.

Germany a knowledge of the plan for the colonization of Pennsylvania and the natural advantages, enhanced by religious toleration and a mild government, which it offered. Penn's "Account of the Province of Pennesilvania in America" and his "Letter to the Committee of the Free Society of Traders" were circulated in German and Dutch translations. Certain of Penn's religious writings were also translated, and the English pamphlets of Thomas Budd and Gabriel Thomas were made known. These and other publications, supplemented by the especial efforts of Furley, brought clearly before the minds of Germans who were inclined to opinions allied to Quakerism the advantages of emigration to Pennsylvania and New Jersey. The immediate result of this propaganda, as we know, was the settlement of Germantown under the lead of Pastorius in 1683,¹ followed a few years later by the arrival of the Pietists who accompanied Johann Kelpius to the banks of the Wissahickon.

But it was not until 1709 that the emigration of considerable numbers of Germans to America began. The forerunner of this was the removal to England, in 1708, of a few score of Palatines, under the lead of Joshua Kocherthal, an Evangelical clergyman. At first it was suggested that they should be sent to the West Indies, but because of the climate and also of the plan to produce naval stores in New York, of which province Lord Lovelace had just been appointed governor, it was resolved to send them thither. These people founded Newburg on the Hudson and their varied fortunes may be followed in the history of that town and its neighborhood.² Though they did not engage in the production of naval stores, the suggestion was borne in mind when, in the following year, the much larger body of fugitives from Germany began to appear. The settlers of Newburg, also, were supported during their stay in England, were transported to America and received supplies of food and tools for a year thereafter. Before they left England they were granted letters of denization. A precedent was thus established for state aided and controlled emigration, and if Lord Lovelace and Henry

¹ The ship Concord, which brought over this band, has been well called the Mayflower of the Germans.

² N. Y. Docs. V, 8, 44, 45, 53, 62; Doc. Hist. of N. Y., III, 541-551; Kapp, op. cit., Ruttenber, Hist. of Newburg.

Boyle—who just then for a short time was secretary of state—suggested the measure, they showed more than the usual originality.

The winter of 1708/9 was unusually cold in Europe and added to the sufferings which war and persecution had already made almost intolerable in parts of Germany. In February of the same winter the British parliament passed its first naturalization law. Though this cannot be considered to have started the movement, its existence, so far as it became known, may have been furnished a temporary encouragement. Of greater effect were doubtless the widely circulated and exaggerated reports of the generous attitude of the British government, and particularly of the queen, added to the vague notions of liberty and comfort in far off America which had their origin nearly a generation before in the publications of Penn and his Quaker associates. We are also told that Louis Michel had been sent by his canton of Bern, Switzerland, to find suitable homes for Swiss colonists in America and had spent some years in exploring the valleys and inland regions of Pennsylvania, Maryland and Virginia.¹ In 1710 Christoph de Graffenried, a member of the Bernese aristocracy, who was looking for a chance to mend his fortunes, in America or elsewhere, met Michel in London and together they negotiated with the Carolina proprietors for grants of land for a settlement. Land companies may have been more active in advertising America than appears on the surface, but the effect of their efforts appears more clearly a few years later.

The result of the operations of these various motives was a mass emigration, mainly from southwestern Germany and Switzerland through Holland to England. During 1709 thirteen thousand of these people, husbandmen, vine dressers, craftsmen with their families, landed in England. Free passage across the North Sea had been provided for them, but on their arrival they had to be publicly supported until they could be settled in the realm, Ireland or the colonies. As they were a less desirable class of immigrants than the Huguenots who had come a generation before, popular outbreaks against them occurred in a few localities. But the queen, the government and the church treated them generously. The episode as a whole may be regarded as connected with the war policy to which Marlborough and the Whigs were so fully committed, for this was the time of the negotiations at Gertruydenberg. For months, though it was in war time, shelter and food were provided for the exiles. The board of trade, using information furnished in part by German clergymen resident in London, considered the problem at many sessions. Briefs and letters were issued which resulted in large collections in the churches and elsewhere. These measures operated as a continued encouragement, till in 1710 decisive measures had to be taken in the Netherlands as well as in England to check the movement, because it was assuming proportions which made it unmanageable. All Catholics who refused to accept Protestantism were sent back and notices were circulated along the Rhine that no more emigrants could be received.¹ In 1712, as a result of the Tory reaction, the naturalization law which had been passed three years before was repealed,² though naturalizations already granted under it were not invalidated.

¹ Deutsche Pionier, X, 189, cited by Faust.

Of these immigrants about five thousand were settled in the British Isles—the larger part in southern Ireland— or found employment in the fisheries. The rest, upwards of seven thousand in number, were sent to the colonies of the American continent. Of these about 650 became participants in De Graffenried's and Michel's North Carolina enterprise. They experienced the usual hardships on the voyage and disappointments in making their actual settlement. The Tuscarora war also brought down upon them an Indian massacre. But the survivors succeeded in establishing themselves permanently at Newbern and thus formed a valuable connecting link between the Albemarle settlement and those which grew up on Cape Fear river, the two giving needed form and extension to the province of North Carolina.³ The largest body — over three thousand in number — was sent by the British government to New York, as state supported and controlled colonists, for the purpose of producing naval stores. Governor Hunter was entrusted with the management of this enterprise and it involved a notable extension of the experiment which had just been tried with the Newburg colonists.

¹ This immigration into Great Britain is treated by all the writers above cited but with especial fulness by Diffenderfer, in a monograph entitled, The German Exodus to England in 1709. Proc. of Pa. German Soc., VII. See also Cunningham, Alien Immigrants in England.

² 10 Anne, c. 9.

³ See the two versions of De Graffenried's Narrative, one in English translation, in N. C. Col. Recs. I, and the other, in German, in German American Annals.

Though a part of these people remained permanently on the Hudson, this experiment in state aided immigration proved an utter failure, and the record of it has been outlined in the chapter on naval stores. Hunter was ruined financially and his administration, the success of which in other respects was notable, was seriously marred by this affair. In his management of it he struck hands with some of the reactionary elements in the province, to the repression of which in general the successes of his governorship were due. It is not probable that upon the site which was selected, or in fact anywhere in the northern colonies, it could have been very successful. But the decisive cause of its failure was the withdrawal by a Tory government of financial support of an enterprise which had been inaugurated by Whigs. Hunter, as we have seen, was a Whig and prominent for his Whig connections; and the wreck of his fortune and plan was a small incident which, with the repeal of the naturalization act, the Sacheverell trial, the reaction at court and the abandonment of an aggressive war policy in Europe, accompanied the rise of the Tories to power in 1710. Some £32,000 had been expended and bills for only £10,800 had been honored at the treasury, when payments ceased. Hunter was left as creditor of the government on this account to the amount of more than £20,000,¹ and his urgent appeals, along with those of the board of trade, continued until after the accession of the Hanoverians, but they met with no response. They finally ceased, though the debt never was paid.

When, in the fall of 1712, the Palatines were told that they must find employment where they could, but hold themselves subject to recall,² they were filled with dismay. Before they left England and when they first arrived in New York, the advantages of the Schoharie region as a place of settlement had received attention. Livingston had diverted Hunter's attention from this region and, as a result of this stroke, secured a charter for his manor and, soon after its representation in the assembly, got it peopled in part by Palatines and for their support furnished supplies for which he was paid £20,000. Livingston was the only person who made anything out of the Palatine experiment. Throughout the hard period of their servitude, in the minds of leaders among the Palatines, like Weiser, the attraction of Schoharie, as a place of escape from a system of compulsory labor and manorial tenant right, had been growing. It was said that the Indians who were visiting England with Schuyler in 1709 had promised the Palatines a grant there. At any rate, during the autumn of 1712 some of the leaders went to Schoharie to view the country,¹ and secured from the Indians a grant of land and a friendly reception. This was followed by the migration of fifty families and, in March 1713, of the main body of survivors. The beautiful valley on which they now settled lay on the frontier, south of the middle course of the Mohawk river, fifty miles northwest of the Livingston manor. Seven villages were founded by them, named after the leaders of the colonists. The friendship of the Mohawks helped them over the initial privations of settlement and by the close of the first season they were beginning to enjoy a little of the freedom and abundance of the fertile country to which they had come.

¹ N. Y. Col. Docs. V, 462. In 1710 Cornbury, then earl of Clarendon, was consulted by the Earl of Dartmouth, secretary of state, respecting the selection of the Hudson river site. Clarendon, to show his dislike of Livingston, condemned it and thus probably helped to prejudice the government against the enterprise, ibid., 195.

² Doc. Hist. of N. Y., III, 683.

But now began a prolonged and bitter conflict with the governor and the Dutch land speculators of Albany. The extravagant grants of Fletcher's time had now been annulled and those tracts were being broken up into smaller grants, for which some of the petitioners were in certain instances heirs of the original patentees.² From the governor and council grants were obtained by Vrooman and the "seven partners" — among whom were Myndert Schuyler, Peter Van Brugh, Robert Livingston, Jr., and Lewis Morris, Jr. — for all the land at Schoharie upon which the Palatines had settled and ample tracts beside. The demand was then made that the Germans should take out leases and become their rent paying tenants. As in so many other cases, the issue lay between the frontier squatter, with only his Indian title, and the proprietor or speculator in wild lands, equipped with his title from the crown. Hunter was offended that the Germans had left the Hudson without his permission, and actively supported the landlords and magistrates of Albany in their efforts to enforce submission. But the Germans, both men and women, were stubborn and hesitated not to defend their claims by force. Weiser proved their most efficient leader, while his son by learning the Indian tongue was fitting himself to become one of the ablest of all interpreters and agents among the natives. One after another the Albany claimants were driven out of the settlements, and Adams, the sheriff, was attacked with such violence that he barely escaped with his life. In 1717 Hunter called representatives of the Palatines before him at Albany and demanded why they had settled at Schoharie without his permission and would not agree with the patentees. He finally ordered all who would not submit to remove, and since they stood together as a unit the further cultivation of their land was prohibited. Palatines who now ventured to Albany were sure to be imprisoned.

¹ Ibid., 707 et seq.

² See entries in Cal. of Land Papers for the years 1710 to 1714.

In 1718 Weiser and two associates started secretly for England to lay their grievances before the crown. On the way they were captured by pirates and lost the little they possessed. Arriving penniless in London, two of them were cast into a debtor's prison, where they lay nearly a year, till money for their redemption could be secured from Schoharie. Before their petition could be presented, Hunter had returned to England and his appearance against them insured the success of the "seven partners." In the mind of the resolute Weiser the determination was already formed to leave New York, but Sheff, his companion, refused to agree with him in this and, after submitting a petition setting forth his views, returned to America. Weiser remained, though without any result, until 1722.¹ At the beginning of Burnet's administration the desire of such of the Palatines as were resolved not to yield to the Albany patentees was gratified by permission to purchase land of the Indians on the Mohawk.¹ About three hundred remained at Schoharie and at least an equal number, under the lead of one Gerlach, removed northward and settled along the Mohawk between Fort Hunter on the east and Herkimer on the west. The last name, together with those of Burnetsfield, Palatine, Palatine Bridge and Mannheim, indicated the origin of this group of settlements. They were planted about 1726, at about the time when Oswego was being founded, and together these towns formed the new frontier of New York until past the middle of the century.

¹ N. Y. Docs., V, 552, 574, 601.

But the territorial policy of New York, together with the exposed position of the frontier and the treatment which the Palatines received, turned the tide of German immigration permanently southward. It is not improbable that when, in 1722, Sir William Keith visited Albany for the purpose of joining in the conference with the Iroquois, he learned of the discontent which existed among the Germans at Schoharie. Weiser and a part of the group who were ready to accompany him resolved not to remain within New York territory. They were encouraged to remove to Pennsylvania, not only by what they learned of the favorable reception with which others of their fellow countrymen were meeting there, but by positive encouragement from Governor Keith. In 1723 a small body of Palatines descended the Susquehanna to the mouth of Swatara creek, up which they ascended to the district known as Tulpehocken, where they settled. In 1728 and 1729 others came and on a grant first obtained from Keith, and later confirmed with some opposition by the commissioners of property, they established a settlement in Berks county, on the remotest point toward the northwest which had then been reached by the extension of the Pennsylvania frontier.² With this episode German immigration into New York almost entirely ceased. By accident, as it were, the only distinct settlement made by Germans in New Jersey occurred in 1707. A number of Germans of the Reformed Church who had sailed for New York were carried into Delaware Bay and after landing started overland for their intended destination. On the way they passed through the Muscanetnong and Passaic river country and were so attracted by the beauty of the region that they resolved to settle there. German Valley came to be the name of the district which they occupied, in the later Morris County, and from there they spread into the neighboring Somerset, Bergen and Essex counties. As usual, they developed the agricultural resources of this part of New Jersey to a high degree, and left a decided Teutonic impress upon the population of that part of the province.¹

¹ Ibid., 634.

² Cobb, Story of the Palatines; Kuhns, op. cit.; Pa. Col. Recs., III, 322.

But the tide of immigration from Germany into the colonies in general, and especially into Pennsylvania, was just reaching its early flood. The stream soon ceased to flow into Great Britain, but it continued toward Philadelphia and southern ports in the colonies. It flowed somewhat slowly until 1727,² when it assumed large proportions and so continued, except in time of war, until after the Revolution. In this movement the Swiss shared, but their contribution came from the Teutonic part of the country, especially from the Cantons of Bern and Zurich. As emigration continued, opposition at times was made by the various German and Swiss governments, but it was not sufficiently persistent to stop the flow. In addition to the general political and social causes, to which reference has already been made in explanation of its origin, special emphasis should be laid on the influence of Pietism among the Protestant sects of Germany and Switzerland, and on the activity of the so-called "Newlanders" or emigration agents who, purely for the profit there was in it, made a business of encouraging the German peasants to ship themselves under contract or indenture for America.

By Pietism is meant the widespread revolt which developed in Germany and the Netherlands in the seventeenth century against the formalism of the Lutheran and Reformed churches. But its remoter origins were far older and deeper, for it consisted in a reassertion of the simpler and more spiritual aspects of religion as they appeared in primitive Christianity and especially at the time of the Reformation.¹ Of the prophets to whose influence and inspiration the movement in large measure was due, prominent mention should be made of Caspar Schwenkfeld and Menno Simons of the early fifteenth century, Jacob Boehme of the early seventeenth, and Philip Jacob Spener, whose activity fell in the latter half of the seventeenth century. Jean de Labadie came into the group through the Reformed Church of France and the Netherlands about the middle of the seventeenth century. The earliest of these reformers were among the radicals against whom Luther contended and who in some cases suffered from the evil reputation of the Anabaptists of Münster. The lives of the latest among them extended even to the time of the founding of Methodism. Both Quakerism and Methodism in Great Britain sprang from the same root as the movement we call Pietism in Germany. The quality which they all had in common was the insistence on the power of the human soul to gain the closest and deepest view of divine things by direct insight and not through learning and logic. Among them all Jacob Boehme had perhaps the strongest psychic powers and hence attained the profoundest views of the invisible and spiritual universe, of which the material frame of things was to his mind only a very partial manifestation. By trade Boehme was a shoemaker and, while thoroughly acquainted with the Bible and widely read in that part of the literature of his time with which he was naturally sympathetic, he was not versed in the learning of the schools. The other leaders who have been mentioned had university training and as clergymen or publicists belonged distinctly to the learned class. But the religious movement which they started was strongly popular and democratic in its character. They all broke with the state-church system, founded small communities, for the toleration of which they strongly contended. Boehme took a rather high view of human nature and of its essentially divine element, but the rest viewed man as hopelessly fallen and capable of restoration only through the atonement of Christ. All of these sectarians, like other

¹ Chambers, The Early Germans in New Jersey.

² Faust, op. cit.; Kuhns, op. cit.; Diffenderfer, The Redemptioners, Proc. of Pa. Germ. Soc., X; Rupp, Collection of Upward of Thirty Thousand Names, etc., reprinted in 2 Pa. Arch. XVII.

¹ Ritschl, Geschichte des Pietismus; Heffe, Geschichte des Pietismus; Jones, Spiritual Reformers of the 16th and 17th Centuries; Sachse, The German Pietists of Pennsylvania; Johann Arndt, Wahres Christenthum.

Protestants of the time, were Bible-reading Hebraists and, except in the case of all but a few choice spirits, that was the only element of culture which they possessed. They insisted upon conversion and a strict moral and religious life as the condition of fellowship among them. Ritual was discarded and simple forms of worship and ecclesiastical organization instituted. The quiet and meditative life, leading in some instances to monastic seclusion, was the ideal of some. In the case of the Labadists community life, like that of the primitive Christians at Jerusalem, was preferred. Among the Moravians, in the early stage of their settlement at Bethlehem, some features peculiar to religious communities appeared, but they were not permanent. The Dunkers of the seventh-day persuasion at Ephrata developed the most complete monastic organization of all, but the group always remained small and the life which they led is interesting as a curiosity rather than from any wide influence which it ever had.

It was in the latter half of the seventeenth century that Pietism gained sufficient headway to become a national movement in Germany. Its force continued unabated till the middle of the following century. Among its effective organizers and leaders were Spener at Frankfort and Dresden, Francke at Halle and later the Count of Zinzendorf who, at Herrnhut in Saxony, revived the almost ruined Utraquist church of John Hus and developed it into the Moravian communion of later times. Arndt's "True Christianity," Spenser's "Piadesideria," or "Earnest Desires for a Reform of the True Evangelical Church," were the text books of the movement, and Paul Gerhardt was its poet and hymn writer. The appeal which was made to the Bible and to a life of personal righteousness, rather than to the spirit of orthodoxy and state patronage, gave deep offense to the Lutherans and Calvinists. Among the results was a secession of certain young theologians from Leipzig and the founding of the University of Halle. Prominent among the seceders was Hermann Francke, who founded the famous orphanage at Halle, which became a leading centre of educational and religious work connected with the new movement. It was this institution which Whitefield attempted to imitate on a smaller scale by his orphan house in Georgia. But Francke, though a powerful supporter of Pietism, did not break with the Lutheran Church. It was he who sent Henry Melchior Muhlenberg to America, through whose effective labors Lutheranism attained its later organization and success in the colonies. Francke and his orphanage became the centre to which Muhlenberg and the Lutheran pastors throughout the colonies directed their correspondence and from which they received advice and help in return. This correspondence is printed in the famous "Hallesche Nachrichten" and shows that that centre was for the Lutherans what the bishopric of London and the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel were for the English Church in America. And when the Moravians appeared they too, under the influence of the broad but for the time somewhat visionary ideas of Count Zinzendorf, did not wholly break with the Lutherans and especially with the spirit which emanated from Halle. Such in brief were the religious conditions from the midst of which the German immigrants into Pennsylvania and the other colonies came. It has been necessary to exhibit these in the foreground, because the chief contributions which the Germans made to colonial life were social and religious rather than political.

The sects which emanated from the Pietistic movement were the Labadists, Schwenkfelders, Dunkers or German Baptists, Mennonites and Moravians. The fact that they sought a more radical reform than either the Lutherans or Calvinists excluded them from the protection of nearly all European governments. This, added to the sufferings caused by the wars, turned their attention to America and resulted in the settlement in Pennsylvania and adjacent colonies of groups representing all of these sects.¹ The first to arrive were a small number of Mennonites who came with Pastorius to Germantown in 1683. Eleven years later, in 1694, appeared at the same place and under the lead of Johann Kelpius a band of forty religious enthusiasts, not of the noisy but of the quiet and mystical type. They had been influenced by the spirit of Jacob Boehme, were theosophists, believed in special revelations and mystical numbers, and had come to seek perfection in the seclusion of the forest. They secured an ideal site on the wooded and rocky banks of the Wissahickon, a branch of the Schuylkill which lies within the confines of the present Fairmount Park, Philadelphia. There they waited for the millenium, while they also abounded in preaching, teaching and other good works. In allusion to the vivid imagery of the twelfth of Revelation, their community was best known by the name of "The Woman in the Wilderness." One of Kelpius' genial delusions was that by means of this community he might bring about a reunion of all the sects of the Pennsylvania Germans.

¹ See the detailed treatment of these sects in Pennsylvania in the writings of Sachse, also Seidensticker in Bilder aus der Deutschpennsylvanischen Geschichte, and Kuhns and Faust, op. cit.

It was not until about 1710, after Kelpius' death, that what was to prove the continuous inflow of Pietists into Pennsylvania began. At this time, as earlier, bands of Mennonites¹ were the first to arrive, coming chiefly from Switzerland, whence they were allowed to depart on condition that they would never return. At home they had given special offence by their refusal to take an oath or to bear arms. Their insistence upon freedom of conscience and their simplicity of life and conduct were qualities which further allied them with the Quakers. Those who now arrived settled on Pequea creek, Conestoga, in what later became Lancaster County, and, as their numbers were increased, they became one of the most substantial elements in the German population of Pennsylvania. In that rich agricultural region Mennonite exiles, who came not only from Switzerland but from many parts of western Germany and Holland, continued to settle for years to come. They became farmers and mechanics, indifferent both to politics and to town life, and leaving almost no record of their doings. Elsewhere in Pennsylvania, especially in the Perkiomen district, representatives of the sect found homes. In the further emigrations of Germans southward Mennonites shared, references to them appearing especially in Maryland and Virginia. To this branch of German immigrants, and in marked contrast to the character of most of them, belongs Christopher Sauer, the printer of Germantown, whose place in the early annals of the Pennsylvania press rivals that of Franklin.

¹ On this settlement see especially The Mennonites in America, by C. Henry Smith. This is a doctor's dissertation of Chicago University.

The fact that the Mennonites rejected all except adult baptism allied them in a way with the Dunkers, who were the next body of exiles to arrive in Pennsylvania. Alexander Mack had very recently founded this sect in Westphalia and after they reached America a group under the lead of Conrad Beissel succeeded and organized the famous monastic settlement of the Seventh-Day Baptists at Ephrata, in Lancaster County. Small groups of similar belief concerning the Sabbath were growing up among English settlers in Rhode Island and elsewhere. The Baptists who continued to observe the First Day were distributed among the settlements of Berks and Lancaster Counties and wherever the Germans went in other colonies. Had it not been for the division caused by their nationality and language, they might have affiliated with their English brethren in many of the colonies; but, as it was, another sect was added to the multitude of such bodies which were increasing with every accession to the population, especially of the middle colonies.

Space permits reference to only one other of the German religious bodies which settled in Pennsylvania and extended from that province as a centre into other regions; that is the Moravians.¹ They were somewhat late in coming, the first body landing in Georgia in 1734. The Salzburgers were German Lutherans, and they had recently sailed for the same province with their pastors, Bolzius and Gronau, and were settling at Ebenezer. Zinzendorf who, with his associates, was full of missionary zeal, was already planning for such an enterprise among the Creek and Cherokee Indians. Spangenberg, his leading assistant and the man who, as bishop, was to play the leading rôle in the establishment of the Moravian interests in America, was sent to London and obtained a grant of land from the Georgia Trustees. Two small groups of Moravian colonists were sent thither, accompanied by Spangenberg and Nitschmann. When, in 1737, hostilities began with the Spaniards in Florida and the ¹ See the Transactions of the Moravian Soc., especially the volumes which contain Reichel's and Hamilton's histories of the Moravian Church. Levering's History of Bethlehem, Pa., is also a valuable work.

Moravians refused to bear arms, a check was put upon the enterprise which resulted in the removal of most of the Moravians to Pennsylvania. But one result of large and permanent importance came from this venture, and that was the bringing of John Wesley into intimate relations with Spangenberg and Nitschmann; finally also with Peter Boehler and so with the Pietistic features of the Moravian faith. From that event Wesley dated his real conversion and that divorce of spirit from the English Church which made him the founder of Methodism.

The Moravians who removed to Pennsylvania remained for a time at Germantown and in the Skippack region to the northeast, without deciding upon any definite place of settlement. Their relations were specially intimate with the small group of Schwenckfelders who were in that district, and Spangenberg also became acquainted with the leaders of the other sects of the province. This was indicative of the attitude, emphasized by Zinzendorf when he arrived, which the Moravians vainly tried to realize, namely to secure an alliance with devout men of all persuasions in practical efforts for the common good. Their missionary zeal, combined with low-power ecclesiasticism and dogmatism, seemed to fit them for a career of this kind. But the cultural basis on which all the sects at that time rested was far too narrow for a result of this kind and it failed. It was, however, in line with this tendency that, in 1740, George Whitefield and Boehler met in Georgia and journeyed to Pennsylvania. Whitefield now formed the plan of establishing a school for negroes in that province and purchased for that purpose a tract of land north of the Forks of the Delaware river. This Whitefield named Nazareth, and without even visiting the place engaged the Moravians to build a house and begin the settlement. But before a year had passed his aggressive and fault-finding spirit led him to break with the Moravians and to order them away from Nazareth. This was followed by their selecting a site for a settlement of their own a little farther south and nearer the Forks. This, on the arrival of Zinzendorf, at Christmas, 1741, was named Bethlehem. Whitefield subsequently abandoned his enterprise at Nazareth and that became the property of the Moravians. Other settlements, like Gnadenhütten, were later founded, and that region — Berks county — became the centre of the Moravian influence in the colonies. It was well located for the purpose of missionary work among the Indians, and that was to be one of the most impressive features in the career of the Moravians. Tulpehocken, the region where Weiser and the Palatines had settled, was further to the southwest on the same frontier, and both it and Bethlehem were favorably situated for mediating between the southern colonies and the Six Nations, a work in which the Germans were soon to have an honorable part.

Enough has been said to indicate in a general way the character of German immigration, so far as it was of religious origin. But it was economic as well, an effort on the part of possibly a hundred thousand Germans, during the first three-quarters of the eighteenth century, to better their condition by removing to America. Even the religious enthusiasts had that as one of their objects, and the multitude who accompanied or followed them were moved by the common and more material motives which always lead to such ventures. The first comers were generally able to pay for their passage and therefore came as free men and free women, but a very large proportion of those who arrived after 1727, when the main current, chiefly from the Palatinate, began to pour into Pennsylvania, were unable to do this and came as indentured servants or redemptioners. In the case of the Germans, the disabilities from which this class always suffered were greatly increased by their foreign tongue. They were not able to converse with the agents of ship masters with whom the contracts were made for bringing them over, or in most cases with those to whom they were sold on arrival. The British immigration agents, called "New-landers" in Germany and Holland, are represented as being even more dishonest and heartless in their robberies than is usual with people in such callings.¹ The conditions on shipboard were at least as bad as those from which similar emigrants from the United Kingdom suffered, though not a few of the voyages passed rather quickly and not unpleasantly.

¹ See the accounts of Mittelberger and Muhlenberg, reproduced by Diefenderfer in his volume on The Redemptioners. Sauer published much on this subject.

But the overcrowding, the death rate, the complaints about poor and inadequate food and drink, the brutalities which must have been incident to such passages across the ocean unavoidably suggest the horrors of the middle passage. Sauer estimated, in 1705, that two thousand of the passengers on fifteen ships that arrived that year died during the voyage. The stories of sales of service which followed the landing and the long delays which were likely to accompany these, the separation of families which usually occurred and the long years of hard and stolid service which must follow, bring home to the reader the discouraging conditions through which so large a part of our colonial population emerged into the comparative comfort which followed. The sufferings of German servants in particular were so great that, toward the end of the colonial period and after the Revolution, vigorous and organized efforts were made by their fellow countrymen for their relief.

German immigration into Pennsylvania resulted in the peopling of that part of the province, roughly speaking, as far west as the Susquehanna river. It is not claimed that the new belt thus added to the peopled part of the colony was entirely inhabited by Germans, for many colonists from the British Isles settled there at the same time; but the population of the region became predominantly German. Another controlling fact, however, is that Pennsylvania was the region from which immigrants were distributed along the frontier of the colonies to the south. The Valley of Virginia and western North Carolina were settled in this way. So also were parts of western Maryland, especially Frederick county and the region of Hagerstown. The slow advance of population from the coast was met or anticipated by a much stronger current coming overland from the north, and in this way the frontier of the later colonial period was formed. Before this time, as we have seen, a few Germans had settled at Germanna and in its neighborhood, and Adam Müller, the first of that nationality who settled in the Valley, came from the eastward, following the track of Governor Spotswood across the mountains. But about 1727 German immigrants from Pennsylvania began to establish themselves on the lower course of the Shenandoah river. They advanced southward through the Massanutten region to Rockbridge, the highest point in the Valley. They also spread westward to the Allegheny range and eastward to and through the South Mountain or Blue Ridge into the Piedmont region of Virginia. The result of this tide of immigration was that the northern half of the Valley was peopled by Germans, while they formed many settlements also to the south, where the country opened toward the valleys of the Ohio and the Tennessee.¹

¹ Kercheval, History of the Valley of Virginia; Foote, Sketches of Virginia; Wayland, The German Element in the Shenandoah Valley; Schmidt, History of the German Element in Virginia; Faust's chapter on the Germans in the various colonies; Bernheim, German Settlements and the Lutheran Church in the Carolinas. There is much illustrative material on the subject in the Va. Mag. of Hist. and in the W. and M. College Quarterly.

This wave of immigration penetrated also into the western part of North Carolina. The settlements there were made in the region of the Yadkin river at about the middle of the century. They, too, were a result of the overflow from Pennsylvania through the Valley of Virginia. A section extending from Mecklenburg and Catawba counties on the southwest to Alamance and Stokes counties on the northeast and covering the entire breadth of the province was occupied by a considerable German population, so that in some parts German was spoken until far into the nineteenth century. Several of the German sects were established there, of especial interest being the Moravian colony of Wachovia, established upon a tract of 100,000 acres in Stokes and Forsythe counties and organized upon the model of Bethlehem. The Palatines at Newbern had no share in the planting of later German colonists in North Carolina.

The Germans who settled in South Carolina and Georgia came through the ports of Charlestown and Savannah. In the first mentioned colony the earliest distinct settlement or town which was founded by Germans was Purysburg, in Beaufort county, thirty miles inland and on the east bank of the Savannah river. This was settled in 1731 by Swiss under the lead of John Peter Pury of Neuchatel. As a colonial agent acting under a contract with the government of South Carolina, according to which he was to receive £400 for every able-bodied man he might bring from Switzerland, he procured about four hundred colonists. Forty thousand acres were granted for the colony and the plan was that its chief industries should be the production of wine and silk.

¹ Va. Mag. of Hist. XII, 134 et seq.

In accordance with the natural tendency of immigrants at this time and especially of those who were assisted to gravitate toward the frontier, the other German settlements in South Carolina were in that region. In 1735 settlements of Germans and Swiss began in the Orangeburg district extending along the Edisto and Congaree rivers and westward through Barnwell, Abbeville and other neighboring counties. Accessions continued to arrive from Europe until nearly 1770. The people were mostly farmers and the climate and soil where they settled were fitted for successful colonization. At Purysburg it was not so, and consequently after a time its inhabitants began to renew the process, continuing until after the Revolution, when the town ceased to exist. Meantime in the upper country Saxe Gotha, in Lexington county to the west of Orangeburg, was settled by Germans from the Rhine country and Switzerland and several other colonies were planted by them, so that a German population became a distinct element in the central and southwestern part of the province. A number of Germans also settled in New Windsor.

In Georgia the settlement of Salzburgers at Old and later at New Ebenezer, the latter town being situated near the river a short distance above Savannah, proved an interesting experiment because of the unusually simple and well ordered religious life which was maintained there under the lead of their two pastors, Bolzius and Gronau. The sectaries of the north did not appear to any extent among the Germans of South Carolina and Georgia. The great majority of them were Lutherans, some affiliating with the Anglicans. On the development of a controversy over the pastorate of the Orangeburg settlement, Muhlenberg visited them, settled the trouble and regulated ecclesiastical affairs in his usually effective manner. Because of the activity and good works of the pastor at Ebenezer, in church, at home and school, that place became the centre of Lutheran influence for both these provinces and was in most direct communication with Augsburg, its parent church, and Halle.¹

¹ Strobel, The Salzburgers and their Descendants.

In order to complete this review of German immigration in the eighteenth century it is necessary to pass from the southernmost to the northernmost colony, and describe what happened on the coast of Maine. Because of its climate, soil and religious exclusiveness, New England could never be an attractive region for immigrants from the continent of Europe. Its population, after the period of settlement, grew by natural expansion within its own bounds and by additions from the British Isles. But there is one exception, and that is found in the settlement of Germans which was founded in 1740 and later under the lead of Samuel Waldo east of the Kennebec river. Waldo's father was of Swedish Pomeranian descent, came to Boston as agent of a Hamburg house and became one of the leading merchants of his adopted town. His son, as we know, was a man of great prominence in the business and military affairs in New England, and was even in the Hanoverian service when its elector became George I of England. After his return to America Waldo became interested in land speculation in Maine, as a member of a body of thirty proprietors who secured the rights which had originally existed under the Muscongus patent. Having obtained for himself one-half of the territory, he sought Scotch, Irish and later German settlers. Waldoborough was founded by Germans whom he induced to come in 1740 and 1742. In order to execute his plan Waldo visited Germany and advertised for colonists, as was done by the "Newlanders." In procuring the second installment he employed one Sebastian Zuberbuhler as agent. Contracts were made which seemed very favorable to the colonists, but Waldo and his agent failed to perform the most important parts of their agreements, both as to the voyage and provision for the settlers after their arrival on the Maine coast. They were left largely to their own resources and, in the case especially of the second and largest party, which arrived in October, they were exposed with such rude shelter as they themselves could provide to the rigors of a Maine winter. Abandoned by those who should have provided for their needs, ignorant of the English language and with scarcely any colonists near who could render assistance, the fate of these people was at best as hard as that of the Palatines in New York or of the most helpless among the thousands who were brought to America in the eighteenth century. So great were their sufferings that, in the spring of 1743, they petitioned Governor Shirley and the general court of Massachusetts for relief. A committee reported that all the parties concerned had violated their contract, but that money should be appropriated to buy provisions and clothing to help them through the winter. Owing to the absence of Waldo, the matter did not come before the house for decision until September, 1743, and then it rejected the report of the committee and left the colonists to shift for themselves. The next year, after the sufferings of the second winter, war broke out. Some of the men of Waldo-borough served on the Louisburg expedition of 1745, of which Waldo was one of the commanders. But in May, 1746, the Indians attacked the settlement and entirely destroyed it. After the peace of 1748 a few of the early settlers who had escaped returned and Waldo brought about thirty families from Philadelphia. The town was rebuilt with more evidences of permanence than before.

Joseph Crellius, who had edited a German newspaper for some years in Philadelphia and who was interested in schemes of immigration, now turned his attention to New England. The Massachusetts government was also becoming aware of the advantages which the other colonies, and especially Pennsylvania, were reaping from foreign immigration. Spencer Phips who, during the absence of Shirley in Europe, was administering the government formed the idea, and in 1749 the general court voted to encourage the settlement of four towns by foreign Protestants, two of the towns to be situated in the western and two in the eastern part of the province. The location selected for the first mentioned town was near Fort Massachusetts, and that for the others was near Sebago Lake, in what is now Cumberland county, Maine. Under the influence of Crellius also, Massachusetts, in 1750, passed an act to regulate the importation of German and other passengers by preventing their crowding and other abuses. Crellius went abroad and carried on other propaganda in order to procure German settlers for these towns. But in doing so he declared himself the authorized agent of Massachusetts and implied that the British government also was supporting his plans, neither of which statements was true. This conduct offended many of the agents who were laboring to procure settlers for Pennsylvania and other colonies. In the violent controversy which followed a very prominent part was taken by Hefret Heinrich Luther, of Frankfort-on-the-Main, who tried to remove the great evils which attended German emigration by inducing the governments of the American colonies to assume responsibility for the safety and comfort of the emigrants. For a time he supported Crellius, but finding that he was no better than the average "Newlander," Luther turned against him also. Meantime, under the patronage of the British government, the settlement of Halifax and the neighboring county of Lunenburg, Nova Scotia, had begun. John Dick of Rotterdam and an agent of his named Kebler, at Frankfort, were attracting many Germans in that direction. This also proved a strong obstacle to the success of Crellius. But, in 1753, the British government checked German immigration into Nova Scotia. Crellius, meantime, had secured sufficient colonists for an additional settlement, called Frankfort (now Dresden), near Waldoborough, and some colonists also came into western Massachusetts. After the movement toward Nova Scotia was checked, Waldo himself again visited Germany and left his son at Frankfort as agent. The result was the procuring of additional colonists, some of whom settled in western Massachusetts. In Maine the later comers founded some additional settlements in the vicinity of Broad Bay and Waldoborough which were permanent and fairly prosperous. The war, hard conditions and disputes over Waldo's territorial rights, which began after his death, discouraged some and, attracted by favorable report of the country, a part of the German settlers later removed to the Orangeburg district in South Carolina. With the exception of a few minor settlements elsewhere, the inhabitants of which in time became wholly absorbed into the surrounding British population, this was the only experiment in German colonization within the limits of New England.¹

¹ The most important source of information concerning the Germans in New England is the series of articles by Rattermann in Der Deutsche Pionier, Vols. XIV, XV and XVI. See also Colls. Me. Hist. Soc., VI, IX; Eaton Annals of Warren; Williamson, Hist. of Maine. The subject is well outlined by Faust.

Attention must now be turned to the immigrants who, in the eighteenth century, came from the British Isles. A certain element of English transported convicts, indented servants and others came in, but so gradually and with such wide dispersion as to make it quite impossible to estimate their numbers. Relatively, however, they were not numerous, it being one of the characteristic peculiarities of the situation that a steadily diminishing part of the population of the colonies came from England, the country which was the seat of the imperial government and which was the leader in trying to impose authority upon them. So far as the United Kingdom was concerned, in the eighteenth century the great mass of immigrants came from Scotland and Ireland.¹ They were of Teutonic origin with a mixture of the Celtic which is characteristic of the people of the Scottish Lowlands and were a notable addition to the complex of races or stocks which made up the population of the colonies. Though their numbers cannot be estimated even with the degree of completeness which is possible in the case of the Germans, their total was large and perhaps exceeded that of any other stock which helped to people the thirteen colonies. Though the term British is properly used to designate the complex of stocks which was thus forming upon our colonial territory even that, as evidenced by the presence of so many Dutch, Swedes, Germans and even French, is far too narrow to correspond with the reality.

The great mass of immigrants of which we are now speaking were Scotch and Scotch Irish.² These two were of common origin, the only difference between them arising from the fact that since the beginning of the seventeenth century the Scotch Irish had lived in the province of Ulster in the north of Ireland, and had been collectively subjected to experiences differing in some respects from those of the Scotch who had remained at home. As in the case of the Germans, so in the case of this immigration, it was occasioned by misgovernment in one form or another. The people were driven from their homes across the Atlantic, or the trend in that direction was started, by oppression, religious and economic, which made them intensely uncomfortable in Europe. So far as cause and motive were concerned, this puts them all in the same class with the Puritans who settled New England. In spirit, too, the Scotch Irish so far resembled the New Englanders that they received a certain welcome there and Cotton Mather, for example, interested himself much in their coming.

¹ The rather well established views on Scottish racial origins are given by Hume, Brown and Andrew Lang in their histories of Scotland.

² The works which deal most fully and satisfactorily with this movement are Hanna, The Scotch-Irish; Ford, The Scotch-Irish in America; and Bolton, Scotch-Irish Pioneers.

The Scotch, so far as they directly shared in the movement, were Covenanters of the period of the Restoration and supporters of the two Stuart Pretenders in the revolts of 1715 and 1745. The home of the Covenanters was in the southwest of Scotland, the same region from which the Ulster Scotch had gone forth. The Jacobites, who were exiled for their devotion to the Stuart cause, were Highlanders. The former were victims of the hideous tyranny which accompanied the efforts of the English Church under the last two Stuarts to establish itself and the crown in ecclesiastical control of Scotland; and they found relief and conditions which were at least tolerable after the Revolution and the accession of William and Mary. The latter, after the expulsion of the Stuarts, and especially after the throne was occupied by a German line, were twice driven by a spirit of romantic loyalty toward their exiled royal house into rebellions which resulted in the death of many and the transportation of many more into the colonies, as the only way to escape from death. To these causes were due the emigration of most of the Scotch who reached America.¹

The Scotch Irish were those who, with a certain admixture of English, were brought together during the first decade of the seventeenth century for the establishment of a Protestant colony or plantation in Ulster. This was only one step, though an important one, in the long process by which the hold of the Irish, with their clan constitution and chieftainship, upon the soil of the island was being broken. Involved as a contributing cause toward this disastrous policy were the bitter religious conflicts of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. As the result in part of confiscations following the final suppression of the uprisings of O'Neill and O'Donnell, lords of Ulster, more than four million acres of land, the territory of eight counties, fell into the hands of the crown or in other ways became available for colonization. Counties Down and Antrim were first settled by direct agreement between the Irish leaders and certain nobles, with their tenants, of southwestern Scotland. But the great plantation of six counties, in 1610, was planned and executed by the governments of England and Scotland. Surveys were made of the forfeited lands and they were divided into estates of moderate size and granted to men of known wealth and substance, who would bring Protestant colonists with them and actually settle the country. Only the poorer and remoter sections were left for the native Irish, though many of them continued to live as tenants among the colonists. Among the grantees were a number of the liveried companies of London, but far the larger part of the territory was granted to Lowland Scotch, with the preference on the whole to those of the southwest, whose homes lay between the English border and the Grampian Hills. They were all Presbyterians, of the type which had already shown its mettle under Mary and was later to withstand all the barbarities of which the Stuart government and its troops under Claverhouse were capable. They were accompanied by their ministers and the entire moral, religious and educational discipline of the followers of Knox was at once established throughout Ulster. So large was the emigration that by 1641 there are said, though probably with some exaggeration, to have been 100,000 Scotch and 20,000 English in Ulster. Maintaining a distinct interest in the face of Wentworth, during the horrors of the Great Rebellion and the perils of the long civil war which followed, and amid the threatened changes of Cromwellian rule, this body attained a cohesion and toughness of fibre which were to appear so conspicuously at Londonderry and Enniskillen in 1689 and throughout all their later history.

¹ See Woodrow, History of the Sufferings of the Church of Scotland, Vols. II and III; also all the standard histories of Scotland. Buckle, History of Civilization; Lecky, England in the Eighteenth Century, II.

Emigration on a small scale from Ulster to America began about the middle of the seventeenth century and continued through the period of the Restoration. This was probably caused by ecclesiastical pressure, especially upon the Presbytery of Laggan, though it by no means equalled the violent persecution suffered in Scotland itself. Several emigrants of this period sought the eastern shore of Maryland, where a few congregations were established. It was at this time and to this region that the Rev. Francis Mackemie came, who was to be one of the leading apostles and organizers of Presbyterianism in the colonies.¹ Before 1690, as we know, Scotch settlers appeared in many of the colonies, as in Barbadoes and other islands of the West Indies, in Virginia and New Jersey, in Lord Cardross' colony at Port Royal in South Carolina, in Massachusetts; but these were not of Ulster origin. The Scotch Irish emigration on a large scale from Ulster was due to conditions in Ireland which followed the Revolution and which persisted through the eighteenth century. These were both religious and economic. In religion the Presbyterians of Ulster were aggressive and dogmatic, as they had been in Scotland, and this helped to provoke the Anglicans, who, though a hopeless minority, were trying to maintain their claims as an establishment in Ireland and to withhold the privileges which Protestant Dissenters were enjoying under the toleration act in England. In 1704, by an act of the English government which was accepted by the parliament of Ireland, a clause providing for a sacramental test was tacked on to a bill for the repression of popery.² The effect of this clause was to exclude Presbyterians from all offices, civil and military, under the crown, and by the influence of the English Church in Ireland it was kept on the statute books until the ascendancy of Grattan and the Volunteer movement forced its repeal in 1779. Legal validity was also denied to marriages celebrated by Presbyterian clergymen, and this disability continued until Grattan's parliament of 1782. It is true that, during much of the period when these disabilities existed by law, their effect was mitigated by indemnity acts or failure to execute, but the galling badge of inferiority remained, while the passage of the schism act, near the close of Anne's reign, seemed for a brief time to imperil the very existence of dissent.

Though the lot of the Presbyterians, when compared with the crushing weight of oppression which the Catholics of

¹ Briggs, American Presbyterianism; Ford, op. cit.

² Lecky, England in the Eighteenth Century, Am. Ed., II, 440.

Ireland suffered under the penal laws, was a favored one, all sects and classes felt proportionately the evil effects of the commercial policy which the British merchants and the two parliaments caused to be enforced in that island throughout the eighteenth century. The prohibition of the importation into England from Ireland of all cattle, sheep and swine, of beef, pork, bacon, mutton, butter and cheese; the exclusion of Ireland from colonial trade and from the right to import from Europe except through England; the suppression of the wool industry — all of these measures being enacted between the Restoration and the close of the seventeenth century — left Ireland with no form of manufacture except a partially tolerated linen industry. This policy, when combined with the vast confiscations of land which had preceded and the almost total annihilation of the social and religious rights of the mass of its inhabitants, broke the spirit of the people and made Ireland, especially in the south and west, a land of blank and hopeless despair. To multitudes who could command the means, removal to England, to the continent of Europe or to America seemed the only way in which to reach tolerable conditions of existence. Such were the antecedents of the Scotch Irish emigration to the American colonies and of the later Irish Catholic emigration to the United States.

So far as Ulster was concerned, an additional cause for emigration which became operative about 1718 arose from the increase of rents, sometimes to double or treble the former amounts, which was demanded by the landlords as the long leases which had been granted just after the Revolution fell in. Also the payment of tithes for the support of the English Church, the services of which the Presbyterians did not attend, was a continuous source of irritation. Now it was that people in considerable numbers began to leave Ulster for the colonies, going in many cases under the lead of the clergy, and this stream of emigration continued to flow steadily in that direction until the Colonial Revolt. It was made up wholly of Presbyterians, whose spirit had been resolute and aggressive from the first and who now went to America under a sense of indignation which boded ill for Great Britain, in case a collision between it and the colonies should ever occur.

The first body of emigrants was attracted toward New England by reports brought by Captain Robert Homes, the son of a clergyman who had already migrated to that region. The Rev. William Boyd was sent as an agent of the congregations in the valley of the Bann to see what arrangements could be made for the removal of a large body of emigrants from that section to New England. He brought an address to Governor Shute, of Massachusetts, with more than three hundred signatures, among which were those of nine ministers. On receiving a favorable reply five shiploads of emigrants embarked and reached Boston in the latter part of 1718. Cotton Mather, Judge Sewall and others welcomed their arrival. Some of the newcomers remained in Boston, others repaired to the Maine settlements and still others to Worcester. Those who went eastward settled at Falmouth, Brunswick and elsewhere about Merrymeeting Bay. Owing to the opposition of the church people already established there, the attempt to build a Presbyterian church at Worcester failed, and the intending settlers removed westward to Palmer and Pelham and beyond the Connecticut river, to Coleraine. But the most important settlement which resulted from this emigration was Westfield, later called Londonderry, New Hampshire. There some seventy families settled, a church was at once established, with the Rev. James MacGregor as pastor, and in 1719 a town grant was obtained. The settlement was laid out after the model of New England towns and, being settled wholly by Scotch Irish, it became the centre of the linen industry in New England and for that reason attracted much attention both in the colonies and Great Britain.¹ From this town Scotch Irish settlers and their descendants spread through the frontier counties of New Hampshire and across the Connecticut river into the territory known as the New Hampshire Grants, which later became the state of Vermont.

As years passed, additions were steadily made to the numbers of Scotch immigrants and the tendency to push them outward to the frontier was confirmed, though with the beginning of Rale's War some who had settled in Maine were temporarily forced back into the more southern towns. After the close of this war, under the lead of David Dunbar and later of Samuel Waldo, Scotch Irish immigrants were brought over and established east of the Kennebec river. They settled adjacent to the Germans, to whom reference has already been made, and helped to confirm the hold of Great Britain on the territory between the Kennebec and Penobscot rivers.

¹ Parker, History of Londonderry, New Hampshire; Bolton, Scotch Irish Pioneers; Ford, op. cit., 190 et seq.; Colls. N. H. Hist. Assoc., Vols. V, VI, VII.

To an extent New York and New Jersey also felt the effect of Scotch Irish immigration. In the Wallkill region, in Orange and Ulster counties, New York, settlements were made and Presbyterian congregations were established about 1730. During the decade or more which followed, other settlements were formed in that region and the Scotch Irish gradually advanced northward toward the frontier which was to be the scene of conflicts in the later intercolonial wars. In 1738 and later the Scotch Irish pushed westward into the upper Susquehanna valley and the region of Cherry Valley was occupied by them. The Highland Scotch also shared extensively in the settlement of northeastern New York, the vast region which later went by the name of Washington County, lying northeast of the Hudson and extending thence to the Massachusetts line and into what was to be the state of Vermont. Encouraged by a proclamation of Lieutenant Governor Clarke, in 1737 Captain Laughlin Campbell came over and viewed lands in this region. He was promised a grant of 30,000 acres, free from all but the charges of survey and the king's quit rent. He went home, sold his estate on the island of Islay and brought over eighty-three Protestant families, numbering 423 adults and many children.¹ But, owing to causes more fully stated elsewhere, the plan was dropped and Campbell was unable to procure redress either from the New York assembly or through the board of trade. After prolonged hardships some of the settlers left the country, and it was not until 1764 that justice was done to those who remained by grants of land in Washington county. By successive additions, made just before the Revolution, this region, as well as that about Stillwater and Saratoga, became a strong Scottish centre. This fact, as well as the settlement of the Scotch Irish in New Hampshire and the "Grants," should be borne in mind by those who wish to understand the resistance which Burgoyne met when he attempted to penetrate with a hostile force into these regions. It was the combination of German and Scotch settlers which so strengthened the New York frontier as in the end more than to counterbalance the advance of the French at Crown Point.

¹ Smith, Hist. of New York, I, 247; II, 50; Colden, Letters on Smith's History, 226 et seq., Colls of N. Y., Hist. Soc. Fund Series, 1868.

But Pennsylvania was the Mecca toward which the great mass of the Scotch Irish, as well as of the Germans, directed their course. Causes material and political, as well as religious, of which the actors were only dimly conscious, produced this result. Some who landed at New York found their way across New Jersey to Pennsylvania. Some stopped on the way and added to the Scotch element which had shared in the early settlement of the Jerseys. Nearly all the counties of New Jersey received accessions, but the westernmost, lying along the Delaware, received the larger part of the Scotch Irish. The great majority, however, pressed on or landed at once in Delaware bay, which in the eighteenth century was the chief gateway through which European colonists found access to the continent. Additions also came from the south through the Chesapeake region and up the Susquehanna river. But most of the new settlers landed at Lewes, Newcastle or Philadelphia. As usual, they followed the valleys and streams. The New Munster region, in Cecil county, Maryland, had earlier received Scotch Irish settlers. Those who landed at the ports of the Lower Counties pushed up the creeks which led back from the bay, helping to people what was to be the state of Delaware and also advancing into Chester county, Pennsylvania, and settling the region of Octorara creek, an eastern branch of the lower Susquehanna. Thence they advanced to Conestoga and spread themselves over parts of Lancaster county. In Chester and Lancaster counties they became neighbors of the Mennonites, Dunkers and other German sects who were also settling in that region. Others, passing up the Delaware and landing at Philadelphia, penetrated into Montgomery and Bucks counties and settled in the neighborhood of the Moravians of that region.¹ Wherever they went they made free with property rights, encroaching upon the manors which had been reserved and showing a general opposition to the payment of rents. It was this spirit which caused Logan to deplore their coming, though their value as a defence against possible Indian attacks was clearly realized. The extent to which they settled along the Maryland border, which was in dispute between the Penns and Calverts, also occasioned some concern.

¹ Hanna, op. cit., II, 60 et seq. Hanna's map at the beginning of this volume shows the distribution of the Scotch Irish throughout the continental colonies.

But the Scotch Irish did not stop east of the Susquehanna river. This they soon crossed and, following the Cumberland valley and the trails which led westward from both Maryland and Pennsylvania, about the middle of the century they penetrated to the vicinity of the later Pittsburg and even across the Ohio river and its southern tributaries. A large block of counties between the Susquehanna and the Alleghany mountains was organized as the result of this movement — York, Northumberland, Huntingdon, Mifflin, Cumberland, Bedford and others — while Westmoreland, Washington and Green were later organized west of the mountains. Thus a distinct section, occupied predominantly by Scotch Irish, was formed in western Pennsylvania, which was to have an important effect on the internal politics of that province.

The arrivals of Scotch Irish by way of the Delaware were far too numerous and persistent for the accommodation which was available in Pennsylvania alone. This was especially evident when taken in connection with the large German immigration which was in progress at the same time. In 1727 Logan wrote to John Penn, "We have from the North of Ireland great numbers yearly. Eight or nine ships this last fall discharged at Newcastle. Both these sets [Germans and Scotch Irish] frequently sit down on any spot of vacant land they can find, without asking a question. The last Palatines say there will be twice the number next year; and the Irish say the same of their people. . . . They say the Proprietor invited people to come and settle his country; they came for that and must live." This condition led to an overflow southward, accompanying the course of German migration which has already been described. Here, as elsewhere, the progress of settlement can be traced by the foundation of Presbyterian churches, and in that connection it will be considered when the religious conditions of the colonies at the middle of the century come under review.

It was in 1732 that the stream of Scotch Irish immigration overflowed the limits of Pennsylvania and began to pour into the Shenandoah valley. The advent of this population, as well as that of the Germans, was welcomed as a protection to the frontier. Governor Gooch, who was a Scotchman, had been reared as a Presbyterian and was favorable to the toleration of that form of worship, though the majority of the council favored a stiff interpretation of the law against dissenters. The general attitude of the government, however, was encouraging and in the course of a generation the southern half of the Valley of Virginia was filled very largely by Scotch Irish, and their settlements also became abundant east of the Blue Ridge in the Piedmont region of the province. A number of able clergymen, especially William Robinson and Samuel Davies—the latter of Welsh descent—were very instrumental in the extension of the Presbyterian faith. Hanover county became the centre of the Presbyterian interest in Virginia, but Albemarle and Augusta and all the counties which later were founded in upper Virginia came to be thickly populated with Scotch Irish, all of whom were dissenters.¹

This tide of emigration flowed on into both of the Carolinas and to an extent into upper Georgia. In the Carolinas it expanded till it covered the up country with a network of settlements. In the case of North Carolina an important body of Highland Scotch came over after the suppression of the Jacobite uprising of 1745 and settled in the region of Cape Fear river. These were also Presbyterians, though their spirit of loyalty, as shown toward the Stuart Pretender and afterward toward George III, was much stronger than that shown by the Scotch Irish. All the central counties of North Carolina, where later the Regulator movement centered, were settled largely by Ulster Scotch. The same was true of the upper districts of South Carolina, where developed the bitter partisan conflicts of the Revolution. The effects upon the politics of all the southern tier of colonies of the coming of this population will appear in the sequel. They were eminently fitted for frontier life, their settlements extended the frontier to the mountains throughout its entire extent, and by the opening of the Revolution they had begun to break through the mountains from Virginia and the Carolinas and to initiate the work of settlement in Kentucky and Tennessee. It was men from among these immigrants who became the most typical frontiersmen, explorers, and Indian fighters of the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries.

¹ Foote, Sketches of Virginia, First Series, Second Series; Foote, Sketches of North Carolina; McCrady, South Carolina under Proprietary Govt. Also the sources already referred to.

A minor element among the immigrants from Ireland during the eighteenth century consisted of Quakers, part of English and part of Scottish origin, whom religious and economic pressure drove to America at the same time with the Presbyterians. They came from all sections of Ireland and became absorbed among the Quaker population of eastern Pennsylvania.¹ They shared also in the later migration of Friends southward into Virginia and the Carolinas and westward to and beyond the Ohio river. Many Quaker meetings were formed or strengthened as a result of this movement, corresponding to the founding of churches and presbyteries which followed the migrations of the Scotch and Irish.

The introduction of large numbers of alien immigrants into the colonies necessitated the adoption of some policy concerning their naturalization.² Two methods were known to the English law by which the advantages of citizenship could be obtained — denization and naturalization. The former was granted by means of letters patent from the monarch, and they might be withdrawn by the authority which issued them. Naturalization was conferred by act of parliament, the statute being either general and applying to a class, or special and designating the beneficiaries by name. Following feudal traditions, the rights conferred were civil and not political and had to do primarily with the ownership and transfer of property in lands. The right of inheritance bestowed by denization was limited, but that which resulted from naturalization was complete. Unlike naturalization with us in modern times, it had as a rule no connection with the suffrage.

¹ Myers, The Immigration of Irish Quakers into Pennsylvania; Weeks, Southern Quakers and Slavery.

² See articles on this subject in Report of Amer. Hist. Assoc., 1893, and in Am. Hist. Rev., IX.

Prior to the reign of James I the law of England upon this subject had undergone little development and it was not foreseen that naturalization, other than that granted in England, would be necessary in the colonies. In his reign, as a result of the religious controversies of the time, the requirement was introduced into the law that no one should be naturalized unless within a month he had received the sacrament of the Lord's Supper according to the Anglican form and should take the oaths of supremacy and allegiance. The object of this was to exclude Catholics. It was not until the Germans flocked in such numbers to England about the middle of the reign of Anne that any precedent of importance was established in England for the admission of aliens to citizenship by statute. Then, as was noted above, a naturalization act was passed for the benefit of the immigrants, the first general law on the subject. This act of 1709¹ extended the privileges of natural-born subjects to those strangers who should take the oaths of allegiance and abjuration and partake of the sacrament before witnesses. Children of naturalized persons were also considered as natural-born. The policy of naturalizing Protestant aliens was thus adopted and the provisions of the act were extended to Ireland, where many of them settled. But two years later the Tories repealed this law, though with a provision that persons already naturalized under it should not be prejudiced in any of their rights.² By a law of 1714, which was passed at the accession of the German line as a precaution against foreign influence, it was provided that no alien, though naturalized, unless he were born of English parents, should be capable of being a privy councillor or member of parliament or enjoy any office or place of trust or receive land from the crown.

Thus far parliament had legislated without reference to the colonies, except so far as the naturalizing of the Palatines in 1709 had this effect. And yet the early charters had empowered their grantees to transport not only subjects to their colonies, but also strangers who would become subject. In not a few instances letters of denization were granted to such aliens before they left the realm. But probably in more cases, and certainly in the case of all aliens who entered the colonies directly from foreign countries, no action whatever had been taken to give them the advantage of British citizenship. The colonies therefore had to take this matter up, as was the case with so many other things. As compared with England, their social and economic condition caused them to favor the influx of foreigners. Even New England was not wholly an exception to this, though its attitude was very conservative, and almost no legislation on the subject was passed by Massachusetts and Connecticut. During much of the period Rhode Island was able to make admission as freemen a substitute for such legislation. The middle and southern colonies, into which came the great mass of foreign immigrants, had occasion to act most frequently on this subject. Following the example of Great Britain, they all issued letters of denization and passed general and special naturalization acts. The power to do this was assumed, letters of denization being issued by the governors though no express authority for it was granted in their commissions. The proprietors of Carolina and New Jersey, by their Concessions and Agreements, conferred on their assemblies the power to grant naturalization "unto all strangers as to them shall seem meet."¹ Maryland began earliest to legislate on the subject and passed a long series of special acts in which recipients of naturalization were expressly named.² As it was expected from the beginning that many foreigners would settle in Pennsylvania, its early laws on the subject of naturalization were extremely liberal. She legalized by statute the titles to property of all aliens who had died naturalized within her limits as fully as if they had been natural-born subjects. By the articles of capitulation the Dutch inhabitants of New Netherland were declared free denizens and their property was secured to them. They were later required to take the oath of allegiance. In 1683 and again in 1715 acts were passed naturalizing all foreign-born inhabitants. In the former act the only conditions were that they should be Christians and should have taken the oath of allegiance. The act of 1715 declared that all foreigners who were inhabitants prior to November, 1683, and now deceased, were naturalized and that all conveyances from them should be deemed good, while those who were still living, being Protestants, should possess all the rights of natural-born subjects, provided they had taken or within nine months should take the oaths appointed instead of the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, subscribe the test and take the oath of abjuration in any court of record. At a later date a large amount of special legislation on this subject was passed, for the benefit of persons named in the acts.

¹ 7, Anne, C.5.

² 10, Anne, C.5.

¹ N. C. Col. Recs., I, 83; N. J. Arch., I, 34.

² Bacon, Laws of Md.

Virginia began legislating on this subject in 1671. The law of that year provided that aliens who desired naturalization should apply to the assembly and, after taking the usual oaths, have an act passed granting them the rights of natural-born subjects within that province. During the next few years a number of acts such as were contemplated in this measure were passed. In 1680 a bill brought over by Lord Culpeper and issued under the great seal of England was passed in Virginia. This authorized the governor, by an instrument under the public seal, to declare aliens who had already settled in Virginia, or such as should thereafter come to settle there, and who had taken the oath of allegiance, to be fully naturalized. With apparent reference to the acts of trade, it was provided that no provision of this law should be so construed as to give privileges to alien-born which were inconsistent with the laws made in England concerning the plantations. In 1705 and again in 1738 the method specified in this law for securing naturalization was reaffirmed. For this reason no such acts as appear with such frequency in New York and elsewhere, bestowing the rights of citizenship on parties by name, were passed in Virginia. The governors bestowed these rights under the authority of general laws.

Though North Carolina received not a few aliens, she did not legislate on the subject of naturalization. But South Carolina, early in 1697, by statute granted full rights of citizenship to all aliens who were then residents of the province, their wives and children. Many were named in this act and its benefits could be secured by others only on condition that, within three months, they should petition the governor or one of the proprietors therefor and take the oath of allegiance. In 1704, in recognition of the general prosperity of the foreign-born already in the province and to encourage the settlement of others, another act was passed for the benefit not only of strangers then in South Carolina but of all who should settle there in the future. This act was unique in that it not only contained the usual provisions about the ownership and inheritance of land, but specified the conditions under which the naturalized might vote for members of the assembly, and also stated that no such naturalized alien should be eligible to a seat in the assembly. When, in 1712, South Carolina adopted a large body of English statutes, included among them was an act of parliament of 1700 (11 and 12, Wm. III, c. 6.) which enabled natural-born subjects to inherit the estates of their ancestors, though their father and mother were aliens. In 1749 this same statute, along with many others, was adopted and made law in North Carolina also.¹

It was under this comparatively liberal action of the colonies, in which they followed British precedents, though with some degree of freedom, that foreigners settling in America obtained their rights of citizenship. Strictly considered, these colonial laws had validity only in the colony which passed them, though one would hardly be justified in asserting that they would not have been given practical recognition, had circumstances demanded, in the other colonies. I am not aware that a test case of this kind ever arose, but the course indicated would have been in harmony with the vague consciousness of a common citizenship which was gradually growing up in the colonies by the middle of the eighteenth century.

Over the subject of naturalization, however, the imperial government exercised a certain control. The act of trade of 1660 prohibited aliens from acting as merchants or factors in the colonies and some further restrictions were introduced by the law of 1696. The judges and law officers in England were strongly inclined to uphold the principle that the grants of naturalization by the colonies were only local in their effect and could not be regarded as bestowing rights of trade or other rights outside the colony where the individual had been naturalized. The action of Governor Fletcher, of New York, in granting letters of denization to Arnold Nodine, to enjoy the rights of a natural-born subject, without restraint and without reference to any English statute, was strongly condemned. In 1698 Governor Nicholson, of Maryland, wrote to the board of trade that he always caused a proviso to be inserted in the acts of naturalization, that they should not operate against the act of trade of 1696. Governor Seymour made substantially the same statement in 1704, and acts of Maryland were cited in confirmation of this. In 1700, as a result of the discussion of the case of Nodine, an order in council was issued forbidding governors to issue letters of denization unless they were expressly authorized to do so by their commissions, and that no colonial act of denization or naturalization would qualify a person to be master of a ship under any statute which required masters to be Englishmen.¹ It was considered that aliens in a colony should not be naturalized in a lump, but in small groups or individually and with due reference to the peculiarities of each. In general, the British government was suspicious of this power, as exercised in the colonies, and was inclined to restrict it by means of instructions to governors and disallowance of their laws, but action was not always consistent and the extent to which colonial naturalizations were generally valid was never settled. If the principle set forth in the act of 1660 and the order of 1700 had been strictly enforced, no alien naturalized in the colonies could have engaged in intercolonial or foreign trade.

¹ The legislation to which reference has been made in the preceding paragraphs will be found in the well known collections of statutes of the colonies mentioned. A North Carolina statute of 1715 also declared in force in that province all English statutes — among others — which provided for the privileges of the people and confirmed inheritances and title to land.

In 1740 parliament legislated for the first time concerning naturalization in the colonies.² After a recognition in the preamble of the advantages of a numerous population and the probability that many foreigners might be induced to settle in America if they were made partakers in the advantages which were enjoyed by natural-born subjects of the realm, the law provided that, after June 1, 1740, all persons born out of ligeance who had resided seven years in any of the

¹ Chalmers, Colonial Opinions, 333; Acts P. C. Cal., II, 348; Col. S. P. Col., 1700, p. 34; Beer, Old Colonial System, I, 70.

² 14, Geo. II, C.7.

British colonies in America, without being absent from said colony more than two months at any time during the seven years, upon taking the usual oaths should be deemed natural-born subjects. Within three months of taking the oaths, unless they were Quakers or Jews, they must receive the sacrament in some Protestant or Reformed congregation and entry thereof be made in the office of the secretary of the colony. Jews, on taking the oaths might omit the words "on the true faith of a Christian." Lists of persons thus naturalized must be kept and sent yearly to the board of trade, and in Great Britain none of these persons should be capable of holding lands or any office or being members of parliament. By an explanatory act, passed in 1773, it was declared that the beneficiaries of the law of 1740 might hold lands and office outside of Great Britain and Ireland.¹ An act of 1761 provided for the naturalizing of foreign Protestants who had served as engineers for two years in a royal regiment, they qualifying themselves as required by law.²

¹ 13 Geo. III, C.25.

² 2 Geo. III, C.25.

CHAPTER VII

PENNSYLVANIA DURING THE ADMINISTRATIONS OF KEITH AND GORDON, 1717-1736

AT the close of May, 1717, William Keith was installed as governor of Pennsylvania. Unlike the executives who had preceded, he was a man of agreeable address and one who had had experience in affairs. He had succeeded Robert Quarry as surveyor general of the customs in America, but after a short term in office had been removed by the first Hanoverian king. He came with a well known Scottish connection and while in the colonies had made the acquaintance of Logan and other members of the council at Philadelphia.¹ They recommended him to Mrs. Penn and the trustees for appointment to the governorship. At the close of 1716 Mrs. Penn wrote to Logan,² "We have all concerned joyned our helping hands to make you easy therein [i.e., in reference to the governorship] and looking over all other difficulties, have at your requests got William Keith commissioned by my husband, and approved by y^e crown, and with a general consent he now goes Deputy Governor over that province and territorys, and tho he was pretty much a stranger to me, yet his prudent conduct and obliging behaviour, joyned with your observations thereon, give me and those concerned good hope to believe that he will prove y^e man you recommended him for. He is certainly an understanding man, and a man of temper, and seems to have made himself master of y^e affairs of y^e Province even beyond what one might expect in so little time." Again Mrs. Penn wrote that Keith had "given me such assurance of his care and zeal in our affairs, as gives us room to hope you may safely consult with him for your own ease and our benefit in cases of property."

¹ We are told that the second duke of Argyle, the opponent of Marlborough and victor at Sheriffmuir, was his friend, and that Governor Hart of Maryland had urged his appointment as chief executive of that province, Logan to Wm. Penn, Jr., Dec. 3, 1719. In the Penn Mss. P & B, 1725-1729. 3, is a long account by Paris, the agent, of Keith and his policy, in which a rather intimate connection between Spotswood and Keith is shown to have existed. Spotswood defended Keith in England against the Penn family and rather discredited their claim to the Lower Counties.

² P. F. to L., V, fol. 74, Narrative of Sir Wm. Keith's Coming to Pennsylvania, etc.; Penn Papers. Pa. Council to H. Penn, per Wm. Keith, 25, 2, 1716.

The earliest official utterances of Keith after his arrival in Pennsylvania were all favorable to the proprietary interests. He so declared himself when his commission was published at Philadelphia and also when, a few weeks later, he met the assembly of the Lower Counties at Newcastle.¹ On the latter occasion both he and the assembly protested against the assumption of government over the Lower Counties by the crown. Penn had always been their proprietor and such they desired him to continue to be. To the assembly of the province, when he first met it in August, Keith enlarged upon the sums which he had expended in procuring the governorship and in presenting an address in behalf of the Quakers to the prince of Wales, who was then acting as regent in the absence of the king.² The need of an adequate support for the governor, and also that it should not be regarded as a burden but as the only means by which he would be enabled properly to serve the province, constituted the chief topic of Keith's address. It drew from the assembly a grant to him of £500, and it is said that during his administration he received from all sources about £1800 per year, Pennsylvania money. This was so liberal an income for a Pennsylvania governor that it alone would furnish strong evidence of Keith's ability and also of the fact that he kept on excellent terms with the assembly,

William Penn, the founder, died on July 30, 1718. In his will it was provided that the earl of Oxford and Poulett, then the famous Robert Harley, should be responsible as trustee for the government of the province until it could be disposed of to the crown or to others to the best advantage.³ The lands and territorial rights were bestowed upon the widow and eleven trustees, part resident in England and part in Pennsylvania,¹ with instruction to sell what was necessary to pay the proprietor's debts and also to convey 10,000 acres each to his daughter, Laetitia, and to his three grandchildren, these last being the offspring of William, his son by his first wife. The great bulk of his American estate Penn's will required should pass to his children by his second wife, of whom three sons, John, Thomas and Richard, survived and, as "the young proprietors," became prominently connected with the province. For William, his eldest son and heir-at-law, no provision was made in the will, he "being well provided for by a settlement of his mother's and my father's estate."

¹ Pa. Mag. of Hist., XXIII, 488 et seq.

² Votes, II, 210; Col. Recs., III, 25.

³ Proud, II, 115, 118, 124.

The younger William Penn had long been a trial to his father and was to continue such to the family during the few remaining years of his life. As the Whig ministry was not inclined to add another to the list of royal provinces by completing the arrangements for the purchase of Pennsylvania which had been made in Anne's reign, the way was left open for the disposition of the government as well as the land of the province within the Penn family. Despite the express provisions of the first proprietor's will, outlined above, William Penn, the heir-at-law, now claimed the government of Pennsylvania as his by right. This was in accordance with what he had indicated as his purpose for a year or two before his father's death.²

By the clause in an act of assembly passed in 1712 provision had been made, in case of the death of the proprietor, for the continuance in office of the deputy governor until further orders from the crown or the heirs of the proprietor.³ Upon receiving news of the founder's death, Governor Keith laid the matter before the council and later before the assembly and they agreed that his administration should be continued in conformity with the above cited act. In order to quiet rumors to the contrary, the assembly also unanimously resolved that he had as full powers of government as when the proprietor was alive.⁴

¹ See General Title of the Penn Family, by Rowle, Pa. Mag. of Hist., XXII, 63 et seq.

² Penn Family to James Logan I, fol. 89-93; Col. Recs., III, 63-68; Votes, II, 247-8, 250; Shepherd, op. cit., 199 et seq.

³ Stats. at Large II, 438.

⁴ Col. Recs., III, 58; Votes, II, 247, 248, 250.

In April, 1719, Keith received a new commission and instructions from William Penn, together with the opinion of three counsellors-at-law to the effect that, because his father's will contained no provision respecting the money which was to arise from the sale to the crown, it operated only to the benefit of the heir-at-law. He also stated that the powers of government were not contested with him by anybody. In view of the fact that not a line had come from any who were concerned for the widow or trustees, Logan had to admit it to be a general belief that, unless the new commission was accepted, "we shall have no power of government among us." Logan wrote to Governor Hunter, of New York, for advice, and the council recommended that as soon as possible the assembly should be called, so that all branches of the government might act together.¹

But a few days later came a letter from Simon Clements, as also an opinion of other counsel and of the board of trade and lords justices, on the relations in which the province now stood to the crown and to all others concerned under the terms of the proprietor's will.² These showed how complicated the situation was, now that the will was admitted to probate. Keith would naturally have been inclined to accept the new commission and to act under it, but his obligations to the proprietary family as a whole forbade this. Logan, too, felt how much simpler it would be if the young proprietor could at once be accepted as such, especially if he could have the land as well as the government. But he knew more of young Penn's reckless character and of his abandonment of Quakerism. He also saw that Penn had done nothing to establish the status which, if he was to be proprietor, he must hold with the British government. He and his step-mother, however, had joined in an amicable suit before the exchequer for the settlement of the property questions at issue. In view of these circumstances it was necessary that Keith should again consult the council and assembly. This he did in the session of May, 1719.³ The reply of the assembly was that for the present the commission ought not to be published and government should continue on its present basis. The reasons which it gave in support of this advice were that the rights of government did not seem to be transferred to the heir by the will, but that the trustees had claims upon it; and that young Penn had not given the security required of a proprietor by the acts of trade or in other ways qualified himself. Seven of the ten members of the council gave similar advice, though the reason on which they based it was that, if it were not followed, the governor would find himself at issue with the assembly.

¹ Col. Recs., III, 63 et seq.; Logan Letter Book, II, fol. 62-65. Logan to Gouldney, Logan to Hunter, April 1719.

² Logan to W. Penn, Feb. 3, 1719. Logan to Clements, Nov. 26, 1719.

³ Col. Recs., III, 68; Votes, II, 258 et seq.

The governor acted in conformity with this advice and informed the lords justices of the course which he was following.¹ It received their approval, as well as that of the board of trade which, as usual, was desirous of utilizing the situation for the purpose, if possible, of securing the establishment of royal government in Pennsylvania. After the situation had been cleared to this extent, in the autumn of 1719 the governor issued a proclamation for the continuance of government in both the province and the Lower Counties, under the authority of laws passed in each of the two sections, until further orders should come from the crown or the heirs of the late proprietor.²

The excesses of William Penn the younger brought his life prematurely to an end in 1720. But, as his claim was kept alive by his son Springett, this event did not bring peace. On the death of Hannah Penn, the widow, her eldest son, John, who developed more business ability than did either of his brothers, was made administrator both of her estate and his father's. By the decree of the court of exchequer, which was not issued until 1727,³ property relations within the family were settled and it was provided that John Penn should hold one-half of his father's real estate in America and Thomas and Richard Penn the other half, they all being tenants in common. John Penn, meantime, had come forward for the time being as the leader in proprietary affairs, as is shown by his correspondence with Logan.⁴ But the situation was

¹ Col. Recs., III, 73.

² Pa. Archives, I, 169.

³ Pa. Mag. of Hist., XXIII, 68, 224.

⁴ See the letters which passed between them in the Logan Letter Books and Penn Papers from the spring of 1726.

still complicated by the uncertainty which existed about rights of government. As Logan aged, his mind was disturbed by doubts on this subject, especially in view of the independence which was assumed by the governors, the attacks which were made on proprietary government and the perils which he saw in the large immigration of foreigners. These subjects, together with details about sales of land, manors, rents and the management of property in general, filled Logan's letters during the later years of his life. But one after another the trustees who were resident in England, all of whom had declined to act, died. Springett Penn also died and all claims which were derived from the heir-at-law were abandoned. The few surviving trustees in Pennsylvania had no thought of asserting powers of government. Until 1730 or after there was occasionally some talk of selling out to the crown, but the indifference of the home government and the growing wealth of the province prevented any plans of this kind from being seriously entertained. In course of time the young proprietors either visited Pennsylvania or otherwise informed themselves about it and the full exercise of territorial and governmental powers came into their hands.

But the uncertainty about the continuance of proprietary government in Pennsylvania, while it lasted, facilitated the plans of Keith to assume a very independent rôle, and the interest attaching to the phenomenon is greatly increased by the use which he made of the situation. The affability of Keith and his apparent fidelity to the interests of the proprietor secured for him the favor of the Penn family and of all its friends during the early part of his administration. On many occasions Logan wrote to various members of the Penn family and to others in the most favorable terms concerning Keith. In June 1717 he wrote, "This gentleman's abilities will render the administration easy to all others as well as just and reasonable in itself." "He is capable of any charge in any government." "From the acquaintance we had with our present Governor, when formerly here, we were apt to believe he could not fail of pleasing wherever he had but an opportunity of being known to persons of judgment." "This gentleman appears so well qualified for the highest posts that I apprehend no other misfortune that can befall on this side if he continues to apply his abilities to the Proprietor's and Country's interests but what may arise from the narrow straits of the people on whom he will scarce be able to prevail for such a supply as his education and present family may require."

Logan and his associates were evidently proud of the governor's good appearance and of the favorable impression which he made in other colonies, so great was the contrast between this and what either of his immediate predecessors was able to do. Late in 1718 he wrote to Joshua Gee, "You will see by everything that comes from the Governor's pen that he is scarce to be exceeded that way. These abilities, with his winning deportment, make him become his post extremely well, and among all our neighbours he is reckoned an honour to the country." The same month he wrote to Thomas Story, "It would, for aught I know, give a general satisfaction to the country here to have our present Lieutenant Governour continued. He wants more money, 'tis true, than any before him, but then he spends it to the credit of the place and his abilities give us a representation among our neighbors."¹

As the months passed, Keith's desire for an ample support and his ability in securing it made a larger and stronger impression upon the supporters of the proprietary interest. This was due not so much to the sums which he received as to the skill he showed in dealing with the assembly which made the grants possible. In this connection appeared the chief feature of Keith's administration. From an early date he assumed a very independent attitude toward the council and the proprietary interests generally. This had been done in a way by earlier governors, but in their case it had not been combined with any skill in the management of the assembly or in the creation of a political opposition. The proprietary interests were now at a lower ebb than they had ever been before, and Keith was not slow to take advantage of this. But in doing so and in striking out upon an independent course he showed some of the qualities of the politician and agitator. In his case a disregard of the wishes of the Quaker leaders which other governors had shown was combined with the ability to carry the lower house with him.

¹ See the letters of Logan during the years 1717 and 1718.

A career was apparently what Keith was bent upon having, without a very definite idea of the point to which it might lead him or the province. Governor Spotswood, of Virginia, was his friend and they had some connection which might possibly have led to an effort to turn Pennsylvania and the Lower Counties over to the crown. Early in 1718 Logan heard rumors that an address favorable to this policy had passed their assembly, though he hoped that the governor had not been concerned in it. A few months later his suspicions were further aroused by the news that a bill had been drafted for remitting the quit rents in the Lower Counties in return for a grant of £200 a year for the support of the government. This was soon followed by the grant of a charter to Newcastle making it a city and thus strengthening its ambition to be a rival of Philadelphia. Later Logan had to confess that Keith never consulted with the council concerning affairs in the Lower Counties and he almost feared that they would become independent of Pennsylvania.¹ Had the proprietors attempted to turn the province over to the crown, we have seen that it would not have surprised or offended men like Logan, but the possibility that a governor should plan or attempt such a thing was suggestive of sedition and highly offensive. That Keith was consciously aiming at such a result as this, his administration is far from showing; but he did pursue a very independent course and treat the authority of the proprietors, as it then was, with something like contempt. It was not often that a governor departed so far from the position of an agent as did he and assume so much of the appearance of a principal. It was because of this that, long before his administration was half over, the tone of Logan's references to him wholly changed.² He was denounced as vigorously as he had been praised and in the end his removal was demanded as an imperative necessity. In this opinion the whole proprietary interest came to share. The events which led to this result it is now necessary to review.

The central fact of Keith's policy which was offensive to ¹ P. Mss., Lower Counties. The figures are not easily read; perhaps the grant was £700.

² See Logan's letters and those of the Penn family, from and after 1719.

the proprietary interest was his attitude toward the council. So far as possible he ignored that body. Especially was that true in connection with legislation. As his administration progressed, he ceased to ask its advice concerning laws and, so far as possible, in all those matters dealt directly with the assembly.¹ By so doing he reduced the council to a strictly executive body and took from it the large influence over legislation which indirectly it had exercised ever since the issue of the Charter of Liberties. As the council was a stronghold of proprietary influence and from its standpoint the balance wheel of the system, this was very offensive and occasioned alarm. In reference to purely executive matters also Keith acted with considerable independence, except possibly in Indian relations, and the councillors saw their powers cut down on that side also.² Logan and his friends became estranged from the governor and a new man was appointed secretary in Logan's place. In April, 1723, Logan wrote that, were it not for the fact that on the decease of the executive government would devolve on the council, most of its members would drop out and appear no more. The governor appointed new members without consulting the others. "I am now superseded in all things relating to the Government except that I still bear, with the rest, the name of a member of the Council."³

Closely connected with this attitude was the refusal of the governor to be bound by proprietary instructions, especially when they came from the hand of a woman, Mrs. Penn. The veto, when the proprietor was absent, had already disappeared, and now when the influence of the family was at its lowest point, came a direct thrust at their right to instruct the governor. In 1723, moved by what was considered to be the dangerous situation of affairs, Logan visited England and brought back with him a long and very forcible letter, in the nature of private instructions, from Hannah Penn.¹ Of course it was easy to understand that this was largely Logan's work, the fruit of his many letters as well as of his present visit. It called Keith roundly to account for his irregularities and neglect of the proprietors, and directed him to assist the commissioners of property, to admit no new men to the council without the consent of its members and to keep at least one half of its membership Quakers, to advise fully with the council in all matters of legislation, and to restore Logan to the secretaryship. At the same time the trustees, Gouldney and Gee, wrote Keith that his continuance in office depended upon his strict compliance with the widow's instructions.

¹ The two opposing views are well stated in "Reasons given Governor Keith by some Members of Council for leaving that Board, the 22d of February, 1717-8," and in Keith's "Observations thereon," Votes, II, 426, 428, etc. The members who withdrew were Norris, Logan, Hill and Dickinson, and the occasion of it was the inadequate time which Keith gave them for considering certain bills which came before him from the assembly. Logan's final statement is in Votes, II, 478.

² See Col. Recs., III, where the journal of the council is printed.

³ Logan to Gouldney, Apr. 8, 1723, Official Corresp. I, fol. 123 et seq.

To Mrs. Penn Keith replied, asserting in the strongest terms his independence of the council in all legislative matters and that at most its members could only be present "as solemn witnesses of the Governour's Actions."² When the assembly met,³ Keith by an artful speech drew from them a renewed assurance that their relations with him were perfectly satisfactory, and then he laid before them Mrs. Penn's instructions and his reply. Logan also submitted a memorial on behalf of the rights of the proprietary family and of himself as its servant. The assembly, after some delay echoing Keith's sentiments, replied that the instructions were an infringement of the liberties and privileges granted by charter to the people of the province, and they asked the governor to assist them in preserving these rights and to ignore any of the instructions which seemed repugnant to the charter.⁴ The discussion was continued further in an academic fashion by

¹ Votes, II, 414, 416.

² Ibid., 417.

³ Ibid., 404 et seq., 414-427, Norris to Gee, Apr. 31, 1725. Official Correspondence, I, fol. 187. Logan's account of this was as follows. "At the House's first meeting upon business on y^e 5th of last month, the Governor made a Speech to them, standing in open court house, to which all persons that pleased were admitted, wherein having first laid a foundation for an encomium to himself, he loudly sounded an alarm to the people to take care of themselves." L. L. B., II, fol. 11; J. L. to H. Penn., Feb. 1724-5. Also in O. C., I, 181. He characterized the assembly as consisting "mostly of plain, honest countrymen, well enough skilled in husbandry but not much acquainted with affairs of this kind, together with some persons of this town [Philadelphia] subservient to the Governor's pleasure, for his arts have been more successful on the populace here than in the country."

⁴ Ibid., 431.

an elaborate statement by Keith, supported by the legal technicalities of David Lloyd.¹ In the council a personal encounter occurred between the governor and Logan over a charge that the latter had falsified the records.² In view of events of this kind, Isaac Norris wrote, "It's plain to everybody here (even his own party say it) that the question now arises whether there be any Proprietary who has power in this province or not."

Turning now to the more general lines of Keith's policy which had contributed to bring about this sharp crisis, a minor point or two connected with the administration of justice should first be noted. In the first year of his administration Keith discussed with the council the question, whether or not judicial commissions should be issued in the name of the king. Practice in this matter had varied both in Pennsylvania and in the other proprietary provinces.³ Keith, in harmony with the trend of events, argued that they should be issued in the name of the king and attested by the proprietor or in his absence by the deputy governor. On the other side, and doubtless chiefly by Logan, it was alleged that the king in reserving to himself the sovereignty over the colonists declared that they were to continue his subjects and he their natural prince, but his royal prerogative as exercised in England could no more be understood to accompany that sovereignty than could all the statutes of England be regarded as in force in the colonies. In support of this admirable statement of the strictly colonial point of view, certain practices in Pennsylvania which were inconsistent with those of England were cited, such as the election of sheriffs and coroners. But after several months had passed, during which news had come of the death of the founder, Keith quietly informed the council that the new commissions which it was now necessary to issue would run in the name of the king. This continued to be the practice during his administration and for some years thereafter.

In the summer of 1719, as we have seen, six laws which had been passed in 1715 for the purpose of putting the judicial system of the province on a statutory basis were disallowed.¹ In deference to the desire of the council, as expressed in a session at which David Lloyd, then chief justice, was specially invited to be present, Governor Keith declined to resort to an ordinance as the means of keeping the courts going, but simply issued new commissions to the justices empowering them to hold court on the days specified in the laws just repealed.² By following this course he quieted the scruples of Lloyd and of the great majority who, like him, considered a judicial system which rested expressly on an ordinance as illegal.

¹ Ibid., 433, 444.

² Col. Recs., III, 242 et seq.; Votes, II, 417.

³ Osgood, Am. Colonies in 17th Century, II, 306; Shepherd, op. cit., 386; Pa. Col. Recs., III, 33-37, 62.

In 1722 another statute was passed reviving the judicial system. The loose expressions to which the board of trade and the attorney general had objected were eliminated, but no enlargement was made in the jurisdiction of the supreme court. This time the act escaped veto, perhaps because it was one of a large number of laws which were not delivered to the board until the five-year period specified in the charter had passed.³ The extent to which Keith sympathized with the tendency to enlarge the jurisdiction of the lower common law courts was shown in 1724 by his ordering the ship Fame to be prosecuted before the court of common pleas in the absence of an admiralty court.⁴ This was an incident in a dispute between Keith and Moore, the collector of the royal customs at Philadelphia, over the seizure of this vessel for the illegal importation of East Indian and European goods. Moore refused to prosecute before an inferior court because it could not hold pleas of the crown. The ship was tried and condemned in the common pleas, but the case was carried to England on appeal. There the collector was advised by the law officers that the proper tribunal for such a trial was the supreme court, before which in 1726 he obtained a final decree of condemnation against the vessel. Before the same court Moore then prosecuted Lawrence and others who were charged with running goods. They petitioned the assembly, raising the objection that the supreme court had no power to issue

¹ Stats. at Large, III, 440, 463-468.

² Col. Recs., III, 90.

³ Stats. at Large, III, 298; Root, op. cit., 168.

⁴ Root, op. cit., 169; C. O. 5/ B. T. Proprieties, XI, R, 52, 53, XII, 84, 87; Stats. at Large, IV, 422 et seq.

original processes. Moore defended his procedure. The house then resolved that the law of 1722 be amended and that no original process be issued by the supreme court in civil causes.¹ Moore then asked the governor—Gordon being then in office—not to assent to this bill unless it contained a suspending clause. But in 1727 it was passed in accordance with the resolution cited, though with a clause providing that it should not be retroactive. The new law also took from the supreme court all exchequer jurisdiction and required that all revenue cases should in the first instance be brought before the county courts.

Richard Fitzwilliam, the surveyor general of the customs, now strongly protested against the confirmation of this act, enlarging, as Randolph had often done before him, on the unfitness of the county courts for the trial of cases in which the rights of the crown were directly involved, because of the mean capacities of their judges and the almost certain bias of the jurors. The law, he also claimed, was in conflict with the act of parliament of 1696, which gave the informer the privilege of choosing the court in the colony before which to bring his action, and if the assembly could take from one court its jurisdiction it might do the like in the case of all courts and thus defeat the purposes of English law and administration. When, in 1730, the act came regularly before the privy council Moore, the collector, laid before it the history of the case and asked for the disallowance of the law. This petition was referred to the committee on appeals, before which, in response to their order, the proprietors presented a statement, drawn by Paris, their agent, setting forth again the reasons for the passage of the act and the view of the proper function of a supreme court such as existed in Pennsylvania. The act was referred to the board of trade, and to it Francis Fane, the counsel, presented a brief against its confirmation, replying to several additional arguments of its defenders. After some further consideration by both the board of trade and the privy council, the act was disallowed in August, 1731.² When the governor informed the assembly at Philadelphia of this result, it expressed regret, but passed a law restoring to the supreme court its jurisdiction as a court of exchequer.¹ With this the struggle over the judiciary in Pennsylvania came to an end, the three applications of its veto power by the crown having secured an original jurisdiction in civil cases to the supreme court.

¹ Votes, III, 8, 11.

² Stats. at Large, IV, 422 et seq.

The chief controversy of Gordon's administration related to the authority under which a court of chancery might be held. In 1720 such a court had been opened under authority of a proclamation issued in accordance with a resolution of the assembly.² This course Governor Keith had followed in response to complaints, because there was no such court and after he had taken the best legal advice available as to the method of establishing it. The resolution of the house was that, considering the present circumstances of the province, the governor, with the assistance of certain of the council, should open such a court. It was the authority of the governor as keeper of the province seal which, here as elsewhere, was relied on as the primal basis of this power. In 1727 it was resolved in council that, when the governor sat in chancery, all the councillors who were in or near Philadelphia should be summoned to attend him as assistants, and that no decree should be pronounced except by the governor as chancellor, with the consent of two or more of the six eldest of the council.³

This court continued in existence without provoking adverse criticism until near the close of Gordon's life. It is true that only a small amount of business was done in it during these years, Gordon himself stating in 1736 that during the nine years and more when he had presided there only two cases had been brought to decree and those by consent, while very few processes had been entered in the court. Therefore he felt surprised when all at once, shortly before the time at which he made this statement, from Bucks and Chester counties and elsewhere came petitions against this court as then organized. The protests which were then uttered were a part of the general movement which had as its object the bringing of the courts fully under statutory regulation. The critics now called attention to that clause in the Charter of Liberties which provided that no person should be obliged to answer any complaint concerning property before the governor and council. Possibly having in mind the right to regulate ferry rates, which was then under discussion with the proprietary officials,¹ some of the petitioners stated that the provision in the charter might be a great security to the people if they should ever be involved in any disputes with the proprietors; but notwithstanding its clear provision the governor and council, who were appointees of the proprietor, sat as a court of chancery for the purpose of trying cases involving property rights.

¹ Votes, III, 168.

² Votes, III, 254 et seq., 270, 271, 273; Col. Recs., III, 266; Shepherd, 391-395.

³ Col. Recs., IV, 35-37.

On receiving these petitions, the assembly asked the governor to lay before it the record of the establishment of the court, which he did. The house then resolved that the court, as then established, was a violation of the charter of privileges, and that the power of determining suits in equity should be vested in the supreme and inferior courts of common law, as the legislature should determine.² Its prejudice in favor of the county courts was again shown by the impractical resolve that the justices of the peace should be granted a minor equity jurisdiction. Gordon and his council met the attack of the assembly with an able argument as to the many precedents in the colonies for their course of action, and in the origin of the court of chancery in England. In their zeal to defend the court they ventured even to juggle with the word property in the Charter of Liberties by insisting that it referred to the property of the proprietors, which was under the management of the commissioners, but not to property relations between private parties in general. Jurisdiction over the latter they claimed was distinct and for nearly twenty years had properly rested with the court of chancery. During that time there had been much legislation concerning courts of judicature and some forty sessions of the assembly had been held, but by no one had the need of a statutory basis for the court of chancery been brought forward.³ But this reasoning did not prevail with the assembly. It passed a bill for the regulating of the court of chancery, which was rejected by Gordon. He, however, sent the papers connected with the subject to England with the request that the proprietors would convey to him their thoughts on the subject. But before anything further was done Gordon died, in the summer of 1736. During the following year, when Logan and the council were in charge of the government, there was no legislation. The law officers of the crown, however, delivered an opinion, at the request of the proprietors, which was intended to confirm the position of the court.¹ They declared that the approval given by the assembly to the action of the court was sufficient to legalize it in spite of the clause in the Charter of Liberties, and that that situation could not be changed by a later resolution of the assembly. But prejudice against the court, because of the feeling that it would be used as a means of supporting the fiscal claims of the proprietors, continued as an immovable obstacle against its establishment. The chancery jurisdiction, in consequence, remained in abeyance and at intervals after 1750 the proprietors were referring in their letters to the desirability of establishing such a court and were expressing their willingness that the assembly should regulate it. They even offered to allow persons other than the governor and council to hold the court; but the opposition of the assembly continued and further steps were not taken.

¹ Shepherd, 81-83.

² Votes, III, 258.

³ Ibid., 269-275. The statement on behalf of the assembly was probably drawn by John Kinsey and Lawrence Growdon, while Logan was of course active in framing the argument on the other side.

In following the subject of the judiciary to a natural halting place we have passed beyond the limit of Keith's administration. Returning now to other aspects of his policy, reference should be made to an early infringement by him on the extensive territorial rights of the proprietor by his appropriating some land beyond the Susquehanna river, on which it was believed that a copper mine might be worked to advantage.² This, says Logan, occasioned "the first important breach" between the governor and those who upheld the proprietary interests. By ordering a survey of this land without consulting the commissioners of property and by attempting to get a return of the survey entered in the council books, Keith seriously offended the entire proprietary interest. It led directly to his breach with the council and to his policy of ignoring it, and this was followed by recriminations and charges of evil motives on both sides. As the so-called mine never yielded anything, Keith was not able by means of it to supplement his income from regular sources, and the episode served only to indicate how freely he proposed to deal with proprietary rights and traditions. It was the opening gun in what was to prove a series of sharp encounters.

¹ Shepherd, 394.

² Narrative of Sir W. Keith's Coming, etc., op. cit., 36; Letter of Logan to John Penn, Feb. 9, 1722, O. C., I, 117.

But the batteries on both sides were brought fully into action when the governor committed himself to the policy of issuing bills of credit. It was largely about this question that the conflicts of the middle and later part of his administration were waged, and it furnished Keith with the fullest opportunity which could be desired for appeals to the assembly and to the people. Soon after 1720, owing probably in large measure to the rapid growth of the province due to immigration, the demand became general for an increase in the circulating medium of the province. Though they were apparently in the midst of plenty, distress was said to be widespread. Exports to the West Indies had fallen off, law suits were on the increase and also the numbers of those who were imprisoned for debt. With the diminution of trade the supply of coin which was coming in from the West Indies was falling off. In the absence of war, which had furnished the chief justification for the paper money policy in the other colonies, these were among the reasons given in Pennsylvania in defence of it. The property tax levied in 1717 was made payable in money, flour or wheat,¹ but no reference was made in the impost laws to an option of payment in commodities. In 1717/8 an act was passed for the encouragement of trade, in which it was alleged that "divers of our neighboring colonies (by their non-compliance with the late act of parliament for ascertaining the rates of foreign coins, and by their laying duties not only upon the product of this country but upon such British commodities as are exported to those colonies) have drawn away a considerable part of our current cash. . . ." To check this a duty of 10% was laid on goods imported from New York or Maryland.²

¹ Stats. at Large III, 131.

² Ibid., 145.

A comparison of the members of the assembly of 1720 with those who were chosen in the fall of 1721 shows a considerable change in the personnel. In 1723 Logan wrote that the two last elections were "very mobbish and carried by a levelling spirit." The governor fell in with this and in his speeches began to draw distinctions "to the disadvantage of those he was pleased to term the great, rich or knowing."¹ The actual utterances of Keith bear out the truth of this statement, for he was continually appealing to the assembly and to the common people behind it as the element in the constitution upon which he chiefly relied and with which he meant to keep on the best of terms.² As he proceeded in this direction, the council dropped into the background and his attitude suggested something in the nature of a plebiscite against the proprietary influence. It was under these local conditions that the demand for a paper currency appeared in Pennsylvania and Keith took it up.

In February 1720/1, a petition was presented to the assembly asking for an alteration in the currency of money. About a year later another petition was presented signed by "a great number of Inhabitants," praying that "the Currency of Money may be raised."³ Efforts to supply the need by making hemp or other commodities current pay were rejected. In May 1722, an attempt was made by the house to raise the valuation of English money and dollars so as to draw them in from other colonies, but on a statement from the council that it would be a violation of the act of parliament for regulating the value of coin in the plantations, it seems to have been dropped.⁴

In February 1722/3, the demand for a paper currency was expressly voiced in several petitions from the counties, they alleging that, owing to the lack of a medium to buy and sell with, the decay of prosperity in the province was evident.⁵

¹ Penn Papers Orig. Corresp., I, 123 et seq.; Logan to Gouldney, Apr. 8, 1723.

² Votes, III, 297, 326, 335, and so on through the speeches of the rest of his administration.

³ Ibid., 286, 303, 305; Stats., III, 314.

⁴ Votes, II, 313, 317, 325; Col. Recs., III, 173.

⁵ The best account of the situation, as interpreted a few years later, is in an address of the assembly to the board of trade in 1727. Votes III, 22. According to the view there expressed, trade with the West Indies fell off

A petition from Bucks county asked that the country produce be made current pay and that no paper be issued. After a long debate on the subject, the house voted for a paper currency. Two days later Logan and Norris were admitted from the council and presented a paper in which they urged that, if bills of credit were issued, the amount should be small and their duration short, like the exchequer bills in England. Scrupulous care should be taken for their redemption. Keith, at the request of the assembly, now took a hand in the discussion, sending in an argument in favor of a rather liberal issue of bills of credit. This was also supported in a communication from two of the original petitioners. To this a rejoinder was made by "gentlemen, merchants" and others who were interested in trade.¹ This is not the place for the discussion at length of the economic views which were advanced or suggested by the supporters of the one side or the other of this question. The purpose here is to show the bearing which the controversy had on the growth of opposition to proprietary government in Pennsylvania. Neither side was opposed to paper money as such; they differed in their estimate of the capacity of the legislature and people of the province adequately to provide for its redemption and then to live up to these provisions. The need of a more abundant and better medium of exchange nobody could deny. In their low estimate of the capacity of the colonists for self-restraint in this matter and their high estimate of the need of caution, Logan and his friends had the support of English precedents and opinion. They were backed also by the entire proprietary influence. They could appeal to the experiences of the New England colonies and of South Carolina as warnings against the danger of speedy and heavy depreciation. This experiment, moreover, was not to be made under the in 1720 and, owing to the diminution in the supply of coin which resulted therefrom, a temporary decline of trade and shrinkage of values occurred. This occasioned the demand for currency. Logan referred in his letters before and after 1720 to a shrinkage in trade with the West Indies and consequent suffering among the farmers. Other colonies also felt it. It was occasioned by lack of money in the islands. Logan Letter Book IV, 26; Ibid., 1717-1731, fol. 209.

¹ Votes, II, 339, 342, 245, 348; Proud, II, 151 et seq.; Shepherd, 406 et seq.

provocation of war. Viewed, therefore, from the standpoint of experience, as ordinarily interpreted, the opponents of paper currency had a decided advantage. Keith and the people who demanded it were of necessity innovators. They were also the debtors, the poorer and more numerous class in the province, whom, according to all proprietary and official traditions, it was unsafe to intrust with the management of affairs. By cooperating with these, as he was forced to do, Keith was again treating lightly at least the spirit of his instructions and the preferences of his superiors. It helped greatly to confirm their opinion that he was a demagogue and widened the breach between him and the council.

An act for the issue of £15,000 in bills of credit was passed in March 1722/3, they to be based on land and houses as security. A loan office was established, as was usual in the colonies where the issues took this form.¹ An act for the issue of £5000, the same not to circulate in Pennsylvania, was passed in the Lower Counties, and this was interpreted as tending to their greater independence. In its autumn session of the same year the assembly passed another act for the issue of £30,000 more, the plea being that the former sum was inadequate.² By this law the bills were made legal tender in all payments.

It was after the passage of these acts that Logan made his visit to England and procured the instructions from Mrs. Penn which Keith so directly flouted. In this document she said that merchants in England were inveighing very much against them and the method of their passage was oppressive to the proprietary family and might have tempted them to have the acts repealed. But they had resolved to allow them to pass, though with the expectation that he would assent to no more such measures.³ West, the counsellor of the board of trade, later gave it as his opinion that they should be disallowed, but this was not done. They were allowed to become law by lapse of time, as was provided in the Pennsylvania charter.

The removal of Keith from the office of governor in 1726 was of course chiefly due to his break with the proprietary

¹ Stats. at Large, III, 324, 360, 385.

² Ibid., 389-407, 518, 519.

³ Pa. Arch., I, 187.

family on the subject of instructions and to his ignoring of the council. But his attitude in reference to bills of credit contributed to the same end, and it was so understood by the assembly at the time.¹ Lloyd, who had then become speaker and manager of the country or governor's party in the house, of course shared this opinion. The extent to which these men, by the end of 1725, had come to believe in the efficiency of bills of credit as a cure for the evils from which the province had suffered is shown in the final address which they then presented to the retiring governor. They declared that they did not have cash enough to carry on their domestic affairs and commerce and that the value of land and country produce was brought so low by the scarcity of money and decay of trade that many families were likely to be ruined. No means, they added, were left for the support of government but an excise and an impost on liquors and these fell short of meeting the public needs. Direct taxation, they claimed, had become impossible. But in two years, under the magic influence of the bills, all these inconveniences had been removed, trade revived, government was well supported without burdening traffic, debtors rescued from the oppression of their creditors, the value of farm products advanced. If the governor's removal, they said, was due to his support of this policy, they wished to declare that what he did was with the advice and concurrence of the people's delegates, constituted by royal grant to act with him in legislation. This declaration they clinched by passing an act for the re-emission of such bills as by the former acts were to have been retired.² It was in 1729, soon after the passage of this law, that the young Benjamin Franklin published his "Modest Inquiry into the Nature and Necessity of a Paper Currency."³ For the time and place this was an unusually acute argument in support of the prevalent opinion, that in Pennsylvania at least more money was needed at the time and that the existing legislation provided for the supply of that need in a satisfactory way. It unduly emphasized the quantity theory of money, as did all opinion on that side of the controversy, that being a natural over-emphasis in a new country with rapidly increasing population and expanding settlements, where means of communication were poor and credit facilities almost entirely lacking. In his "Autobiography" Franklin wrote concerning the pamphlet: "It was well received by the common people in general; but the rich men disliked it, for it increased and strengthened the clamor for more money; and, they happening to have no writers among them that were able to answer it, their opposition slackened, and the point was carried by a majority in the House." "My friends there, who considered I had been of some service, thought fit to reward me, by employing me in printing the money; a very profitable job, and a great help to me. This was another advantage gained by my being able to write." Franklin held throughout his life to the fundamental opinions expressed in this pamphlet.

¹ Votes, II, 483, 485.

² Stats., IV, 38.

³ Sparks, Writings of Franklin, II, 254.

In the face of such a weight of opinion as this, supported as it clearly was by the example of other colonies which had committed themselves to the policy of issuing bills of credit, it was evident that Patrick Gordon, the new governor, would have still to make concessions to this spirit. On his appointment the board of trade had informed him that if any more acts of this nature were passed, they would be obliged to recommend their disallowance. This information he laid before the assembly at its second meeting after his arrival, and suggested that the last act for re-emitting bills might fall under the censure of the board. The extent, however, to which Gordon at once fell in with the main current of opinion is shown by his speech at this time to the assembly and by a subsequent letter to the board of trade.¹ He was "no wise prejudiced" in favor of paper currency when he arrived in Pennsylvania, but on inquiry into its effects he confessed himself fully convinced of its benefits. In consequence of its issue, more British goods had been imported, more ships built and prosperity in general had been promoted; but what was most encouraging, after a temporary depreciation, the currency had recovered its value to a considerable extent. Logan wondered that Gordon should have yielded so completely, but the truth was he added, that no adverse comment on the bills would then be tolerated. Logan himself had to admit that they had been "of very great service to the country."¹ This, of course, was the natural effect of a supply of a needed circulating medium the amount of which had not yet been increased to excess.

¹ Votes, III, 4, 24; Col. Recs., III, 264.

Though the agitation for further issues was continued with the usual result that from time to time they were secured, the governor and council exercising such restraining power as was possible, the currency question never again so seriously affected the course of affairs in Pennsylvania as it did in the closing years of Keith's administration. Keith remained for some time in the province and tried hard to control affairs in both the province and Lower Counties. He was returned to the assembly from Philadelphia county, but failed of election in the Lower Counties. Andrew Hamilton, the famous lawyer, however, was elected to the assembly in both sections and held one or two important offices besides. His support was of great value to the proprietary party. The bill for remitting accrued quit rents, which Keith had tried to get passed, was rejected. On complaints of oppressions by its mayor's court, Gordon removed the magistrates, and thus virtually revoked the charter of Newcastle. By these means the anti-proprietary movement in the Lower Counties was checked.

At this juncture Lloyd broke with Keith and joined the supporters of the new governor.² Keith entered Philadelphia with a troop of followers and tried to supplant Lloyd in the speakership. But he received only three votes and his efforts to lead an opposition totally failed. Alexander Spotswood had strongly supported Keith's attitude toward proprietary instructions and had even labored with the Penns in England to prevent his removal, and, because it was understood that Spotswood's chief interest was to see Pennsylvania made a royal province, Keith now boasted that he might yet return as a royal governor. In the spring of 1728 he quietly left for England, where he cultivated for a time the friendship of Springett Penn and may have busied himself somewhat with schemes of colonial union. His activity in the sphere of

¹ Logan Letter Book, IV, fol. 27, Logan to Gee, Dec. 14, 1726.

² Votes, III, 55, 67-84; Col. Recs., III, 347, 353-360; Stats., IV, 98-116. Many letters of Logan and Gordon during the years 1726 to 1729. Logan's account of a talk with Spotswood is in O. C., I, 167, letter to J. Gee, March 8, 1724.

Indian relations while governor and as an adviser of the board of trade upon the subject of naval stores and other features of imperial policy after his return to England have elsewhere been noted. After his departure, Keith's supporters for a time caused some disturbance in Pennsylvania. Eight of their number withdrew from the assembly because they could not secure the issue of a writ for the election of a member to take his place. Business, though with some difficulty, was carried on without them and they remained away until the life of this assembly was terminated by the fall election of 1728.¹ So menacing did disturbances of the peace at this time become in Philadelphia that the riot act of George I was proclaimed and the assembly asked for permission to meet in one of the other counties to escape the insults of the populace.² But on the failure of Keith to return, disorder subsided and proprietary rule was gradually reestablished on normal lines.

Owing to the death of Hannah and Springett Penn, from whom Gordon's original commission had been issued, doubts arose as to its binding force. Hence, in January, 1732/3, the three younger proprietors, John, Thomas and Richard Penn, issued a new commission to the governor.³ This, as usual, contained the proviso that he should take no action affecting property without the request of the proprietors. A revised set of instructions was also issued which contained some additions to the former list. One of the new instructions was to the effect that he should consult the council in reference to all acts of government,⁴ especially in calling assemblies and passing laws. He was not to approve any more acts for the issue of bills of credit unless they contained a suspending clause. John Penn, by application first to the duke of ¹ Votes, III, 45, 47, 49, 51, 52, 53, 59; Col. Recs., III, 298; Pa. Arch., I, 211.

² Col. Recs., III, 340, 341; Votes, III, 62, 89; Logan Letter Book, III, fol. 13. Logan to Proprietors, Apr. 30, 1729. Logan tells of 200 men with clubs who had agreed to come to town and join with others there to coerce the governor and assembly into passing another currency bill, and that three or four score actually came, but retired on notice of the measures taken to keep the peace.

³ Penn L. B. I, 65, 73, 74. The original commission of Gordon was issued by Sprignett Penn, as heir-at-law, with the consent of Hannah Penn. It was therefore strictly in line with the claim of William Penn the younger.

⁴ Pa. Arch. I, 189.

Newcastle and then to Sir Charles Wager, the Walpoles and Lord Wilmington, got Gordon approved, with the direction that he should take the oath and otherwise qualify before the governor of Virginia, "as Colonel Ogle did."¹

But Gordon was already so aged that it was certain that he could not hold the office many years longer. The course which should be pursued after his death or retirement was already worrying the young proprietors. Thomas Penn had gone to Pennsylvania and John had consulted the act 7 & 8 Wm. III, c. 22 and taken the advice of Paris, the agent, and Willes, their legal counsellor.² Both of these were clearly of the opinion that, in order to qualify as deputy or governor in chief, the oath must be taken. They could not act under a law of the Pennsylvania assembly, for that would violate the act of parliament and would also be conceding altogether too much to the assembly. As one possible way out of the difficulty John Penn suggested that they wait until the test act was repealed in England, toward which result the dissenters were then making a combined effort which it was hoped would soon be successful. If the Penns kept quiet till then, they might qualify without an oath. Various courses of action were discussed and the death of Gordon found them still in doubt as to the course which should be pursued. Logan and the council then assumed temporary charge of the government till a new governor should be appointed, but with the express understanding that legislation should be suspended, although the assembly met at the usual intervals, the annual election was held and the discussion of public affairs was encouraged.

¹ Ibid., 88; Col. Recs., IV, 509, 525, 529.

² Ibid., P. L. B. I, 78.

